Sixteen years elapse and Vera is a beautiful girl, budding into womanhood and is beloved by her companions. Alda revisits the scenes of her early shame, attired in the height of fashion. At a gay party she meets Harlow Ellsworth, who is touring the country. Harlow leaves the party to go on a jaunt and meets Vera as she emerges from the chapel. He accosts her politely and she is not averse to his well meant attentions. He walks with her to her home and she poses at the gate for a photograph to add to the collection of the tourist. They part with an implied understanding that they will meet again. Harlow and Vera go rowing and he shows her as the proof of her photograph and then tells her he loves her. They bait near Father Jules, who is sleeping. He awakens in time to save them the upset.

Father Jules meets Vera and commands the girl to tell him of her love affair. She does so and he is satisfied that the attentions of the young American are honorable. Harlow again meets Alda with a party of cronies and he accidently drops the photograph of Vera. Alda picks it up. She immediately recognizes the likeness of her child and questions Harlow, who does not reply. She follows him, leaving her companions abruptly, as he goes to join his friends. He finds Father Jules festival and the venerable man of God conducts him to the chapel and points to the stone on which the child who so found sixteen years ago.

As the story is ended Alda approaches and takes in the situation. She fruitlessly divines that Vera is her daughter. The girl approaches and is sent to Harlow. The mother confesses and the young American is called and presented to her. Harlow denounces her. She bows her head in assent.

The priest emphatically refuses to allow her to disclose her identity and tells her to seek consolation in God and commands her to the care of two nuns. Vera, not understanding, turns to Harlow, who takes her in his arms. Father Jules enters the chapel following the sorrowing mother.

The lovers walk away to plan for the future and the venerable woman is lost in thought—her mind reverts to her youth, which is very interesting, and constitutes the greater part of this drama. Mrs. Jackson awakens from her reverie, saddened by the memories. Her face is tear-stained and her body convulsed with sobs. Edward and Polly approach and she turns to them joyfully. She again takes the young girl in her arms and clings to her, admonishing Edward to cherish and protect her. Edward is embraced, and extolled as a dutiful son. The young people receive the blessings of the parent.

CUPID'S VICTORY.—Major Cathcart has a daughter who bears the name of Madie. The Major finds himself with a mortgaged estate on his hands, the mortgage being held by old Colonel Brandywine, who has loved and lost, Cynthia, the Major's sister. Colonel Brandywine determines to get even with Cynthia by marrying her niece.

The young girl has engaged herself to Fitzhugh, Cynthia overhears and informs Fitzhugh of the Colonel's intentions. The young man promptly proceeds to call upon the Colonel. Their interview is interrupted by the arrival of Cynthia. The interview between the Colonel and Cynthia results in a reconciliation, and they determine to help the young lovers. The next problem is to get rid of the Major, who has forbidden Fitzhugh the house, to give his consent. They plan that the Colonel will continue his demands for Madie's hand, and that at the marriage ceremony, Cynthia will take her place, wearing one of Madie's dresses and her face covered by a veil.

This is done, the old Major sadly leading his daughter to what he believes to be the sacrifice. After the marriage he lifts the veil for a kiss and to his amazement finds the laughing face of Cynthia before him. He is so relieved to find that the Colonel has not married his daughter that he readily gives his consent to Fitzhugh, after the deception is explained to him.

THE HINDU PRINCE.—Mr. Aug. Jones writes his wife that he is bringing home Prince Seika, a Hindu hypnotist. At the entrance of the Jones' household the Prince becomes infatuated with Mrs. Jones. After the husband becomes insane the Prince advises Mrs. Jones that he be placed in an asylum. He arranges with a clergyman to marry them, the ceremony is about to be performed, but is intercepted by the return of the husband who has been cured after remaining in the sanitorium for several months. Upon entering the room Mr. Jones discovers that his wife is in a strange mood, and realizing that the Prince has her under the hypnotic influence, he commands the Prince to release her from the terrible spell. The Prince refuses. Struggle ensues. Mr. Jones chokes the Prince into submission and compels him to bring Mrs. Jones out of it, which he does.

A MIDNIGHT VISITOR.—John Brown and his wife are asleep in bed. Mrs. Brown hears a noise in the next room. She endeavors to awaken Mr. Brown, but he pays no heed to feigned sleep. Eventually Mr. Brown enters the room adjoining in his pajamas. As he enters he hears a terrific crash in the next room. Frightened, he makes a break for the door, but on the way out he spies a bottle of beer and takes a good drink of its contents. This over, he again advances determinedly toward the fatal door, when lo! from out of the chaos of crashing dishes he hears the soft strains of a melody issuing from the dining room. Arriving at the door he no longer sees one but several, and making for the one nearest him he enters (so he thinks), and slips comfortably into an easy position on the floor, the bottle clasped tightly to his bosom. Meantime Mrs. Brown starts for the scene of battle. She hears crashes, and calls the police captain and his assistants. They tiptoe toward the door, but do not find a burglar in operation

Harry warns the banker. The robbers enter, they are caught, but Harry's step-father is trying to escape, shoots the banker. Harry interposes and he received the shot in his own breast.

He transforms a rose into a beautiful damsel he places on the floor two dummy figures which, at his command, become animated and indulge in a lasting and wearisome match. He next produces a table and causes various refreshments to appear on it, and also produces a little party to partake of same, which they lose no time in doing. On the return to the magician's apartment our hero decides that he would like to see once more the damsel who so recently danced and disappeared. With a few motions of the wand he manages to produce her, but she doesn't like it, and slaps his face. Our friend then thinks he would like to see some beauties, but the heaven pummel him numerously. The table cracks him on the head, and then the magician appears. He dismisses him in wrath for interfering with his mysteries after first magically adorning him with a set of donkey ears.

TROUBLES OF A TRIP.—The jovial Jones and his wife decide to take a trip to town. Jones makes up his mind to take advantage of the opportunity by having a good time on the sly, and lays his plans accordingly, but unfortunately for him his better-half discovers his scheme and interferes with a vim, just as he has commenced to enjoy himself in the midst of his hilarious friends.

NESTOR.

COULD YOU BLAME HIM?—Col. Bailey declared that his nephew, Tom, should be his heir, providing, of course, that the young man consulted his uncle in selecting a wife. This, however, was just what Tom neglected to do; for when he married Bess Oakley, he labored that his bride should win over Uncle Joe before the old gentleman learned of their secret.

But no sooner had they returned from their honeymoon than Col. Bailey announced his intention of paying Tom a visit, throwing the young couple into a lively state of panic. At last after a good deal of persuading upon Tom's part, Bess consented to let him claim Jim, Dick's widow, to the house and pose as his wife until Uncle Joe's blessing could be asserted.

The excellent opportunity which it offered of teasing her husband was not to be overlooked as Dick instantaneously spurred his spirited friend. Consequently, the pair made poor Tom's life miserable upon every possible occasion.

It was after one of those "pleasant evenings" when Tom was telling his wife good night that Uncle Joe came out of his room, and stood aghast at his nephew's conduct. But this was not all, for, having sent the maid to bed, Bess called her husband to unlock her dress. The old colonel stood breathless for a moment then marched up to the door and peeped through the keyhole. There was his nephew, whom he had always considered such a fine fellow, embracing another man's wife. Hence, however, his thoughts were interrupted. Dick appeared upon the scene, doubling him by the coat, the unhappy uncle hustled Dick downstairs, then threw himself into a chair declaring he had an attack of heart trouble imploring the vanished young man not to leave him, but to ring vigorously for his nephew.

The instant he appeared, Col. Bailey suddenly recovered, and after sending Dick away, had no time in acquainting Tom of his opinion. So worked up had he become that he absolutely refused to believe his nephew's confession, and it took both Dick and Bess to soothe his ruffled feelings and persuade him to finally see the humor of the situation.

CHAMPION.

THE BACHELOR'S OLD MAID.—Because her Uncle Peter never embarked in the matrimonial sea, is no argument why she should not do so, opined Mary. So she holds a candlelite meeting with John, a dashing young sowsee, to whom entrance to the house was forbidden.

On coming home unexpectedly, Peter supposes the young couple together and after dismissing John and forcefully him, decided repeating the offense on pain of being shot, he tries to pursue and pacify his wilful niece, whom he really loves, by giving her an agreement, upon her return that if he could find the reason for a money row that should have ever safely come to a close that he would grant his consent to her marriage.

Soon the minds of the two young folks set to work planning with the following results: John, who resides in an adjoining town, has a married aunt, of solemn an unctuous and wins to particularly opposite to that in fond her association toward gaining the aid of his friend and good influence.

Upon his direction she pens a love note to old Peter whom she has never seen, asking him to meet her at a designated hotel to which room is to take her. Peter receives the note, and he, copies all gallantry he can possibly effects in dress accordingly and makes off with an object to the rendezvous.

Soon after his arrival, Peter is gaily smitten and fails for the Maid's audacious snapshots of love at tack. The affair is brief, however, she manages to get his ring before he leaves, which is in accord with the events prose. When John replies the ring he becomes possessed of rigorous and he has his aunt taken to Peter's home.

Poor Peter is in a dreadful state when the old maid calls and on attempts a denial of having ever seen her before but she displays the ring he gave her, which she still wears and the proof is conclusive. Therefore, on betterment of his agreement, he must give his consent to her engagement to John. Thus he is finally prevailed on to give and peace is sovereign once more.

The spinster reasonably assumes Peter's ring, but Peter is grave to the occasion and refuses it on her finger with a promise that she keep it there and therefore his wife. The consequence is roughly for and she accepts. With the full knowledge that a double wedding is on tapis at the house of our time simple housebound as now bid them adieu.

EDITH HAS SPORT.—Upon seeing her father's keeper about to shoot on his day's work, forthwith persuades that somewhat stout individual to allow her to accompany him. Upon the eventful day does. Armed with a gun, Edith skips along, and soon outdistances the keeper who vents in the woods while the girl, taking her rifle to her shoulder tries at some numerous ducks. Much to her astonishment she hits one right in the barrel of her gun, and then comes a struggle with an irate farmer and the keeper. Leaving them disputing,

The names read from left to right, starting at the top: Adriene Kessell, leading lady; Warren Kerrigan, leading man; Randolph Grey, heavy leads; David Fisher, juvenile leads; Hart Farley, leading character parts. These faces are well known wherever good pictures are shown.

Edith wanders off and takes a pot shot at a cat which is being mulked by an old lady who gets a most severe shock when the attack to nuisance animal disappears. In quick succession Edith brings down a gaily painted weather cock, "pots" a water tank and upsets an autumn, who comes crashing to earth. By this time her quivers have grown to a good half dozen and Edith finds herself classed by a mounted policeman. Sure thing at him, when another appears, and presently it is a very demoralized little girl who is led away by the policeman. But it all ends happily. Edith's father settles all claims for damages, and it is fairly certain that Edith will not be allowed an other day's shooting for some time.

YANKEE.

HER MOTHER'S FIANCEE.—Mrs. Rudolff a wealthy widow, had been left some years ago prey to a titled foreigner. They plighted their troth while the widow was almost exhausting her only daughter and the pleasure of the occasion was expected daily to attend his nuptial ceremony. In honor of his arrival, the widow had prepared a garden fete to introduce her prospective husband to her friends and intimates. The step from girlhood to womanhood is a small one accomplished by the difference between short and long dresses and wearing the hair down the back or on top of the head.

When the widow first met the Count her daughter was a little girl in short dresses, and returning from boarding school with her long skirts she was a very attractive young woman which the mother saw in her worried way was quick to realize. A woman may be as old as she looks but not as often she feels. Such circumstances were in evidence, therefore, the daughter was requested to temporarily return to her short skirts for the Count's benefit but owing to the fact it appeared that little girls could not attend the garden fete she rebelled, but the mother was obdurate. The daughter met the Count as a little girl and acted the part; for she played many a kid prank upon the two lovers, much to their embarrassment. The night of the fete arrived and so did the daughter but in her proper garb, where she met the Count and where that aforesaid person real ized that the daughter was even more attractive than the mother.

Moonlight on the water has been the result of many a romance. That was the result of the Count's and his prospective stepdaughter's boat ride on the bay. The Count was a poor oarsman, he had both oars in the water and when he got the vest the couple were marooned on a barren island for three hours and not rescued until the next morning. The night was cold and the chill first protected his charge with his coat—then his arms—the result was to leave the widow gained a son-in-law instead of a husband.

TOM AND JERRY.—Two well-to-do brothers, Tom and Jerry, have been separated in business for years and the affection existing between them is something remarkable. Through the loss of his wife, Tom is given to drinking and shows sign of a mental breakdown. This culminates in a complete aberration when his only daughter elopes with a comic actor in the Golden West, who has been visiting relatives in the vicinity.

Jerry receives a telegram from Tom asking for a lock home and he decides that a change of scene would be beneficial to Tom's condition. They go West and discover that the eloping couple are having brought family jewels, heirlooms and the proceeds of the sale of the Eastern property.

An adventurous known as "The Badger Queen" in league with a desperado, has been doing the Lady Bluffer act among the wealthy of New Mexico and Arizona. It is a singular method they adopt to secure loot. Some unsuspecting victim has car accidents and then disappears. Her paramour threatens exposure and is usually bought off. They play the same game upon the unsuspecting brothers and make their "getaway." They are, however, under suspicion and the sheriff soon rounds them up and recovers the loot, bringing them back for identification. This leads to the happy reunion of the brothers, the restart of the daughter and her little child happy in the love of her husband and his mother brings a ray of reason to Tom's mind and he eventually is restored to health and his reason returns.

FIVE HOURS.—Jack Hazard remarks that it is a simple thing to break into a house and plunder. A heated argument ensues during which Jack says which a wager of five hundred dollars is made that Hazard cannot steal anything worth taking within five hours.

Hazard departs upon his mission and pauses at a house close to which an officer is smoking. Jack decides to make that particular house the scene of his operations, but he finds it difficult to gain entrance. So he feigns drunkenness and the policeman offers to ring the bell. Jack commands him not to do so as it will awaken his wife so the officer gives Jack a boost through a window that has been left open. Jack goes upstairs and enters a room where a girl is slumbering and on the dresser spies her jewels. Just as he is appropriating them, the girl awakens, and pointing directly at him a revolver, insists that he telephone the police that there is a burglar in the house.

He attempts to convince her that it is only a bet and shows her the agreement between him and his fellow clubmen and at last she feels assured that it is a bet, so when the police arrive, she tells them that the burglar has escaped and seems in the direction he was supposed to have taken and when she gets back to the room finds that Jack has concealed himself and taken the jewels with him. In the meantime, Jack has returned to the sporting club and claims the bet. The next day he returns the jewels to the rightful girl and restoring her possessions, he also offers a little token, for the indirect compensation which aided to make good—and he was rewarded.

MR. J. C. DEAGAN, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR:—The Electric Saucer Bells arrived all O. K. last Friday. We had them installed in our theatre and started them on Sunday following, and it is our pleasure to inform you that they have given the utmost satisfaction. Our audience was wild with enthusiasm. Each selection rendered by the orchestra, in which they used the Bells, was greeted with a round of applause. The installing of the Bells increased our patronage at once. People hearing of them wanted to come and hear them, and all expressed their great delight with this latest novelty. They are classy, and add quality to any theatre. In consideration of our appreciation, we most heartily give you our unsolicited testimonial as to their merits, and hope it may induce other theatres to install them, which will surely result in a pleased customer and a paying addition to any up-to-date theatre.

Yours very truly,

THE THANHOUSER WO-A-WEEK

Released Tuesday, Apr. 4

A Drama of the Heart

The Charity of the Poor

is a story with a striking theme and moral, for it tells of the reformation of a rich old codger with a heart so steely you'll vow at the outset he NEVER COULD be reformed! What brings the change of heart is indeed wonderful to see, and pleasant, too. With the change vanished a peculiar quality of selfishness that the rich man actually believed was love, and in its place came an affection so true and so lasting that you'll marvel at it even as the chief recipient marvelled at it.

Weighed and Found Not Wanting

is the story of an odd assertion of honesty—odd because totally unexpected, considering the time, the conditions, and the man. It is one of the better-class subjects that give genuine entertainment and still point a moral that is worth something. It helps you by adding tone to your place. It helps us by making you glad there are two Thanhousers every week.

That's the true test of friends, it is said. In business, however, it is a test of the belief in ultimate success.

The loyal ones are now being repaid for their steadfastness through the gruelling storm which the Sales Company has so successfully weathered. Every day the Sales Company is demonstrating its enormous power for benefiting its customers.

It is to-day the most solid institution in the industry, standing for and soliciting trade on a pure business basis of "value received" quality.

Compare this with patent bullyrag, clique strategy, intrigue and organized deceit—there's a difference. It is represented in this

Get Two Imps Every Blessed Week

And if one exchange won't give you what you must have to be successful, another will. Our Cuban releases are taking like wildfire with the public and you are positively standing in your own light if you do not heed our advice. Take for instance

"THE LOVER'S SIGNAL"

Monday "Imp" Release of April 3, 1911

APPROX. LENGTH 980 FT.

A pretty love story with the Cuban individuality. Obstacles are thrown in the way of true love and the stern parent is circumvented by means of a whistle, which is the signal agreed upon by the lovers to meet. The girl reads a newspaper account of the supposed death of her sweetheart. She is stricken and loses her reason. The well remembered whistle of her lover restores her sanity in a unique manner. The exacting parent now gladly removes all objections to the marriage. This is the sort of a story which has made "Imp" films famous all over the world.

"MAZE OF FATE"

Release of April 6th

The sensational plunge over the falls by the victim of the wrath of plotting villians furnishes one of the most thrilling pictures ever thrown on a screen. A young lawyer sets about it to prove the innocence of an old drunkard and succeeds in an original way. He also wins the love of the daughter, who is doomed to disappointment by the death of the hero in a highly dramatic manner. A story of the West, with a strong plot and heart interest. See "Maze of Fate" and then tell us if it isn't one of the grandest pictures you ever laid your eyes on. Advertise it at least one week in advance.

It Doesn't Make Any Difference

how much of a crank you are concerning your film service, deep down in your heart you know that I can satisfy you. But how in the world am I going to do it unless you let me? Isn't it about time that you call my bluff? Never have I been in a better position to give you what you want than now. Never have I bought as many reels. Never has Independent service been as uniformly good. Is there anything on the licensed side one iota better than Imp, Reliance, Thanhouser, Rex, Nestor, Powers, Bison, Great Northern, etc., etc.? Bet your life there isn't! Are you really stuck on paying that $2.00 per indefinitely? Can't you see, Man, that bye and bye General Filmco will hatch out some scheme to get hold of your theatre just as he managed to get the licensed exchanges? Will you do with your theatre as a certain exchangeman did—travel all the way to New York and beg the General "Please do take my exchange?" I don't want to frighten you—but why should you take any chance at all? Become Independent—be your own boss, take the bull by the horns and do it right now. TEMPORARY ADDRESS:

445 Broome St., Broadway, New York City

ADAM was the first of us mortals to discover the truism, "AS YE SOW, SO SHALL YE REAP," and ever since his early day down the long vista of years to March, 1911, men have reaped as they have sown.

"As Ye Sow, So Shall Ye Reap"

Released March 30th, 1911

is a photographed sermon on the frailty of youth and the penitence of maturity.

It shows the planting of a wild seed and the inevitable harvest of regret and remorse.

In the first chapter—Sin!

In the second—Remorse!

And then—Retribution—All's well that ends well.

It's a great dramatic subject, full of heart interest—it's a ℜEX, and it's bound to be good.

Work for the Convention.

The call of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD for a Convention of Exhibitors, to be held in Chicago this summer on some date yet to be decided upon, has struck such a responsive chord that we already feel enthusiastic as to its success. Exhibitors from Maine to California have written to us commending the project and assuring us of their presence if such a convention takes place. Others have written suggesting subjects that could be discussed with profit at such a gathering, and again others have written asking for further particulars. Some have inquired if it is to be dominated by the film manufacturers or the exchanges or any trade organization.

To the latter we reply that the First National Convention of Exhibitors, as projected, will be for exhibitors only. The manufacturers, or their representatives, will be invited to be present, as also the exchange owners and managers, but only as representing their respective interests. These interests have their own periodical gatherings to discuss matters of importance to their welfare. Hitherto the exhibitors have not convened, except as local bodies, and the necessity for a strong National organization, such as can grow out of this convention, is apparent.

While self-preservation is sufficient reason for the formation of a National organization, progress should be the watchword of the Convention. Organized progress towards better projection; better pictures; better seating arrangements; better methods of obtaining and sustaining the patronage of the public; better methods of handling the crowds that do attend well regulated moving picture shows. Competent speakers on these subjects will come forward and the interchange of ideas will be beneficial.

Legislation which affects the industry will be discussed and ways and means suggested to protect the interests of the exhibitor. Take as an example the attempt at present being made by Ohio legislators to establish a law prohibiting the use of any but N. I. film in the State of Ohio. If such an arbitrary and uncalled-for measure were enforced, hundreds of exhibitors in the State of Ohio would be ruined; and if such a law became effective in one State others would follow suit.

With a National Association of Exhibitors, a nominal membership fee for each theater would create an ample fund to engage the best legal talent in the country to defend their rights. State associations are all very well, and necessary, to regulate minor matters; but to combat powerful adversaries it is necessary to engage the most influential legal talent, an expense which could only be met by a National organization.

Also at this great gathering of exhibitors, which should fill the largest convention hall in Chicago, they would be able to inspect all the latest devices. Space would be reserved in the convention hall for manufacturers' exhibits. All the projecting machines would be on exhibition, patent screens and substances for screen coating would be demonstrated, chair manufacturers would have their displays, builders and decorators would have models or photographs of their designs, ticket choppers, booths, gate check devices, lobby displays, advertising signs; in fact, everything pertaining to the business, and every manufacturer would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity. The impetus to the business and the educative effect of such a display cannot be comprehended.

The statement has been made to us that such a convention would not be agreeable to the powers that be, meaning, of course, the film manufacturers. This is not so. Every film manufacturer to whom we have broached the subject has given it his approval. All will realize the benefits of bringing the exhibitors together for interchange of ideas.

Friends and foes alike agree that the Patents Company has been the backbone of this business. We have reason to believe that the Patents Company will look upon a representative convention of exhibitors as a necessary step towards the placing of this business upon a firmer basis.

If the exhibitors mean business and at the National Convention get together and talk business, the result will be better business for all concerned. We have had in the past several gatherings of moving picture people which generally ended in disputes or disruption, which were sometimes fiascos and sometimes ended in orgies not to the credit of the participants. If the exhibitors are serious in their desire to convene in a manner that will reflect credit upon the industry, they will have the hearty support of all the manufacturers and ourselves.

The MOVING PICTURE WORLD invites communications from exhibitors on this subject and suggestions as to matters of interest that can be brought up at the meeting.

The Exchange and the Business

More than a year ago we were taken to task by a competing publication for hazarding the theory that the middle man, or the exchange, was an essential factor in the moving picture business. At that time some people were rash enough to affirm that in the new condition of things in the business that were coming into force, the middle man, or exchange, was superfluous. The proposition was absurd on the face of it, and we said so. Events, of course, have shown that we were perfectly right. The film business, like any other business, must conform to the needs of distribution. It is no more possible for the exhibitor to deal direct with his manufacturer than it is for any other tradesman. The distribution of manufactured goods can only be properly handled by distributors. This is axiomatic.

Our recent articles on The Open Market have won commendation throughout the entire American moving picture field. We have said enough, we think, for the time being. We do not intend, however, to let the matter rest there. At the proper time and on the proper occasion, we shall revert to the topic, because it is our firm conviction that it is of vital importance to the business as a whole that there should be an open market. Events are supporting us in our attitude. Things are happening in the film world which it would be neither fair nor judicious to speak of at this juncture. There is likely to be a readjustment of primary conditions. Parties as they exist today are likely to be changed in their inter-relationship in the near future. As our readers know, we are not alarmists; we have never played the role, and never will. All we have to state at the moment is that the Open Market in the not-distant future will probably be an assured fact. Moreover, the Open Market, when it comes, will not disadvantage any reputable elements in the business.

But before the open market is lined up, something will have to be done towards bringing about a new condition of affairs at the exchange end of matters. In the last number of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, two exhibitors voiced what is a general dissatisfaction with the present condition of affairs in respect of exchanges and their methods. There are, as the reader knows, two groups of exchanges, one operating under the ægis of the General Film Company, the other under that of the Sales Company. We offer no opinion as to how these people conduct their business, but we do think, speaking generally, that there is room for improvement in the middle section of the industry.

We have complaints both verbal and written from exhibitors of the "take it or leave it" policy, which the exchanges at present are constrained to follow. In an ideal condition of things, the exchange should be to some, if not to a large extent, a free agent, competent to pick and choose for the benefit of his service—otherwise the exhibitor, otherwise the public. At present he may be competent to do so, but he is not free to do so. The result is that being without any selective option, exhibitors and the public have to be content with the "take it or leave it" policy.

* * *

Is this for the general good of the business? We think not. Our ideal exchange man should be as thoroughly informed at all ends of the business as any other man in it. His buying power should not be limited or restricted. He should be so well equipped as to turn down unsuitable films and push those of quality, and quality only. By well equipped we mean that he should make a study of public needs, know a good film from a bad one, be a discriminating buyer, and therefore do his part towards helping the manufacturers on the one hand to uplift quality and the exhibitors and the public on the other, to be supplied with the best in the qualitative sense.

There is too little discrimination amongst exchanges: They are so deficient in individuality and independent that we write this article for pointing out that herein lies one of the obstacles for the betterment of the business. At present the exchange man is more or less a passive cipher. The time, however, is coming when, we think, new types of men will be called for in the exchange end of matters. It is not sufficient that a renter should compete in service rates, that he should be amendable to rebates and favor one manufacturer over another, but that he should take his stand on quality, and only encourage the production of those pictures which the exhibitor and the public demand and that is the very best.

* * *

As we know and as we have been told over and over again, the moving picture business of this country is very largely an exchange proposition. The exhibitor is practically the pivot of the business; the exchange in a measure the fulcrum, and a very powerful fulcrum, indeed. With a chain of intelligent independent and enterprising exchanges throughout the entire country, the business would, we think, receive a much-needed stimulus: something would be done towards assuring the much-desiderated open market. The future of the business rests very largely in the hands of the exchanges. They have it in their power to largely influence manufacturers for the better order of things.

It is worthy of note that in the present condition of things, the exchanges are largely under the control of manufacturers. It is a moot point as to whether this is to the advantage of the business as a whole. We should be glad to hear from our exhibiting readers on this subject.

CINES OF ROME.

This European film manufacturing concern, whose announcement will be found upon another page, ask us to say that they have not as yet affiliated themselves with any American distributing agency, although their name has been coupled with that of the National Film Manufacturing & Leasing Co. The Cines films have a great vogue in Europe as will be seen from the large list of distributing branches mentioned in their advertisement. Occasional subjects have been released in this country and the quality of the photography, subject and acting has invariably been of a high order. We are informed that the Cines organization is prepared to make six releases per week and ten would not overtax their facilities. Six regular stock companies are employed, one of which specializes in big spectacular historical productions. In some of these as many as 400 people are employed. A notable Cines film of historical value, and which was secured at great expense, was a pictorial record of the private life of the late Count Leo Tolstoi. It is to be hoped that arrangements will soon be completed whereby a selection of the Cines films will be exhibited in this country, many of them being really masterpieces of the motographic art.

The Rejected Manuscript

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

The editor of this paper has received a number of complaints from authors concerning the treatment of their scenarios by producers, few of them justified, many of them based on rejection alone, but all containing the pathetic note of the writer who has put forth an honest effort with no reward, immediate or prospective.

Each house engaged in the production of photoplays contains individuals in authority who have individual likes and dislikes, exactly as in the publishing business. The most experienced writers have MSS returned one or more times, and it is not a bad plan to revise stories sent back with a view to their improvement before launching them again. In a large majority of cases they simply fail to meet certain established requirements or contain serious faults of construction. A common fault is that of merging the scenes. An inexperienced author showed me such a scenario involving a court scene where the photograph of a much-wanted woman was in evidence. A messenger was sent for her and brought her in during the scene, though he had to hunt up the photographer to obtain her address, go from the photographer to her house, put her under arrest and bring her to the court. He could not have done it in the few elapsing seconds if he had used an airship. It never occurred to the writer of that scenario that it was his business to clarify the situation, not to confuse it. In the case of another author, several scenes were merged in one depicting a fox hunt through roads, fields and forests in story form. No author need expect either editor or director to do the hours of work necessary to separate and rightly arrange the various scenes of his photoplay. It is the author's business to relieve the director, and not to burden him with unnecessary labor. The director may change the arrangement of scenes, but he can not be expected to construct the entire play.

The plain truth about these little plays is that the amount paid for the best of them is all out of proportion to the knowledge and effort required to write them. A great many qualifications must be possessed by an author before he can successfully embody in a scenario all the essentials to a dramatic presentation of life. There should be an idea conveyed in every play whether for the stage or for the screen. Intense characterization is a strong feature of both, but extremely difficult to portray where no words are used. Then the characters should not be stronger than the situations, and woven in and out of a string of thrilling, or at least interesting, incidents, there must be a plot. To write a really great photoplay an author must have the power of creating strong characters true to nature, and must possess an elevation of thought that will drive his ideas home to the hearts of a mixed audience in spite of all the imperfections of the average exhibition. In view of the trifling sum offered for the best original scenarios the wonder is that any are submitted.

Many of the best plays submitted involve a vast amount of work for their presentation, or call for types and scenery not easily found. The director is only human. His duties and responsibilities are beyond all conception of an outsider. Without glancing at the array of good, bad and indifferent scenarios submitted, he is the hardest worked man in any producing organization, yet he must study what he is asked to put over. He must adjust his imagination to that of the writer, try to see with the same eyes what must be pictured on the mental screen before it can be arranged for the actual one, and he can never be blamed for not seeing what is not written, nor can any author reasonably expect him to be attracted by what is badly written. Even when the idea is good and the scenario is a clear portrayal of the story to be told, it may be unsuited to the cast obtainable or prohibitive in other respects. Many of the most successful plays have been rejected more than once before they reached the notice of someone equipped to produce them. The gentleman who sent in a play involving a fox hunt did not give due consideration to the difficulty of pulling off such an event. Private affairs of that kind, held rarely, at places remote from the producer's base of operations, not interesting to the great mass of Americans, are prohibitive in more than one sense. The difficulty of sending an entire troup of actors to the scene, rehearsing and acting the play, are too numerous to make the incident worth while.

A weak spot in many otherwise strong producing concerns is the lack of a competent art director, one who is a good judge of plays and can co-operate with the stage director in their production. Such men do not grow on every bush, and the present need of them is not fully appreciated. They are absolutely essential in every growing concern, but hard to find. Bernard Shaw says those best qualified to judge of the quality of plays are too busily occupied writing them. "For after all," the world's greatest dramatist says, "the play's the thing." It is. No director can do himself justice unless he has the right kind of material to work on as well as work with. A vast amount of time, money and patience are wasted in trying to put over playlets which, in spite of some cleverness, lack many of the essentials which count in the sharp silhouette of a picture play. The director may cloak the skeleton in ample folds of splendid drapery, but the bare structural bones will "out" like murder.

The easily-pleased part of an audience is not a safe guide in selecting scenarios. Time was when any old adaptation would do, but that time has passed by. People now go regularly to the little theaters, they see the best and demand that the average shall be raised to something like it. Directors of earnestness realize this and are wearing their lives out to meet the higher demand, the constantly increasing demand for what is original and vigorous in this class of production. There is a cry from steady patrons, heard through the better class of exhibitors, for dramatic effort of the highest rank. There is no such thing as writing over the heads of the people. Strong plays go with all classes. Give each one of the characters a passion and let them fight it out.

Most of the cases of ill treatment so far examined come in the nature of complaints from the unappreciated. To these playwrights I would advise greater care and that sort of study which has no feast. Writing big plays is a thing to be learned, and these little ones afford good schooling even if the rewards are small. The main thing is that spirit of sincere determination that is without blame.

"That not the laboring years
Blind-born, nor any fears,
Nor man, nor any gods can tire or tame."

Moving Pictures in Advertising

No Longer an Experiment—Used by Largest Advertisers in America
Value of the Descriptive Style—Inexpensive and Easily Transported

By Watterson R. Rothacker, General Manager, Industrial Moving Picture Co., Chicago.

(Republished by courtesy of The Commercial Union, Chicago, Ill.)

HOW great an advance has been made in moving pictures as they concern advertising will be realized by anyone studying the issue. The advertisers at present using this method of illustration are all getting results. As a matter of fact, however, while moving pictures enjoy a world-wide popularity, their advertising possibilities have not been investigated thoroughly. That they are apparent to the many, and receiving just now much notice from the advertising fraternity may be attributed to the sheer merit they possess and their superiority over ordinary photographic advertising which is of acknowledged value.

As An Advertising Medium.

Moving pictures as an advertising medium are reliable, efficient and practical. They are no longer an experiment. Their cost is made reasonable by reason of mechanical multiplication. Their introduction to the public has been accomplished, their power of illustration is obvious, and while the surface of this great field has been merely scratched it has made good its promises so far and is rich in possibilities which will fulfill the most extravagant claims as to further development.

More Attractive.

The effect of well-illustrated advertising is known. Photographically illustrated advertisements are decidedly more attractive than the advertisements presented by words alone. The better the photographs the more powerful is its advertising appeal and beyond all question and doubt animated photography is the superlative descriptive force.

Advertising Films

Ultimate Users Business Men.

The ultimate users of moving pictures for advertising purposes will come from every walk of business. At the present moment a number of firms that manufacture heavy machinery, such as steam excavators, log-loaders, and machines used in harvesting, mining and irrigating, are giving a real demonstration which has all the advantages and effects of the original from which the negative was taken, and possesses the extra advantage of being conveniently portable and incapable of slighting a single part of the action.

Success Already Demonstrated.

Those who have so far taken the moving picture out of the amusement category have found that their theory has worked out in practice far beyond even their most enthusiastic anticipation. When an advertising story is being told on the screen there is nothinig which distracts the attention of the on looker. The arguments are presented to the eye undisturbed by diverting influences. The sheer novelty of the scheme carries weight and those who are using it now receive credit in the comment caused by this novelty.

No single photograph can conjure to the mind's eye an action implied by a stationary picture. The throb and movement of life adds zest and interest to any scene and where this action explains a process or demonstrates a use much has been accomplished which is impossible by any method other than moving pictures.

How They Are Used.

Many large advertisers lay much stress on the magnitude of their plants, the sanitary conditions of their factories, the care with which they assemble their machines, their shipping facilities etc.; by moving pictures these features can be depicted as they usually exist and pure assertions are backed up by pictorial proof.

Photographic accuracy inspires confidence. Therefore, moving pictures are reliable expositors. They occupy a unique position in this regard and are the only power which can bring the mountain of commercial and agricultural activities to the public posing as Mahomet.

Easily Transported.

A reel of moving pictures weighs about eight pounds. It may be easily carried and expressed to any part of the country. There is hardly a hamlet where a projecting machine is not available. Moving pictures are of standard size. Thus it will be seen how easily a salesman can carry with him the actual records, operations and scenes which by mere words are insufficiently suggested to the prospect.

How many advertising campaigns are founded on the idea that the customer is interested in where an article comes from and how it is made? How many people are attracted to an article of product because of the fascinating story which is woven around it? The answers to both these questions are many.

The Descriptive Style.

Take the story of automobile tires and show this industry from tree to boulevard. Show how the grain is taken from the fields, made into flour and prepared for the public. Picture the construction of an automobile and the exciting tests it must undergo before it is put on sale. Disclose intensely interesting scenes of industrial activity in any line and identify the name or trade mark of the manufacturer, and you have at your disposal a wonderful advertising force.

Then there is the moving picture play which entertains the consumer while his buying instinct is being aroused. This plan is the most subtle advertising ever conceived. Advertising apparently without advertising is decidedly more potent than a direct commercial announcement. One will remember a name connected with an incident long after the memory of printed words has faded. Moving pictures make definite impressions and produce lasting recollections.

Advertising Intent Should Be Concealed.

In arranging a moving picture play of advertising intent, the advertising should be deftly concealed. Care must be taken that accuracy is not sacrificed to dramatic effect and that the subject is not burlesqued by too much comedy. These picture plays are far more comprehensive, attractive and convincing than the audible or printed "ad."

Trade marks, slogans, catch phrases and names become living things in moving pictures. They have new and broader significance; they are animated and imbued with human appeal; they stick in the memory.

Best Ad Never Written.

The advertising value of moving pictures is now recognized by all progressive advertisers. I have stated that the best advertisement in the world will never be written, because moving pictures are the superlative advertising medium and exceed the limitations of the pen. I do not think that this assertion is too strong.

Cost Is Small.

The cost of moving pictures is not prohibitive, as so many imagine. Their expense as compared to the results accomplished is ridiculously small. Mechanical multiplication is responsible for the low cost. So after the negative has been secured the positive prints which are used for exhibition cost but very little. To be more definite, they may be had as from 10 cents to 25 cents a running foot.

The cost of the negative depends largely on the magnitude of the production and the preparations of the setting. In picture plays customarily gone for the picture, and special scenic effects are in many instances desirable. The usual industrial subject depicts business and manufacturing operations as they daily exist; consequently, the camera man has but to take care that he realizes on his opportunity and chooses his scenes with a regard for their value to the advertiser.

It is advisable in using a moving picture film that a specialist direct the work. The negative corresponds to the ordinary "copy" and quite as much depends on its pulling power.

The circulation, of course, should be laid out along logical lines. That is to say, the pictures, to secure best results, should be exhibited before the class of people most likely to respond to the advertising. Manufacturers of farm implements, irrigating machinery, etc., seek the State and county fairs and agricultural communities. Moving pictures of mining machinery find their public accordingly, while moving picture plays, which give general publicity to a name, trade mark or product, have an unlimited range and widest latitude.

Their Place as Advertising Mediums.

Moving pictures have a substantial place as an advertising medium. They are recognized by boards of education all over the world for their power to illustrate. They are distinctly superior as a supplementary advertising force, are sufficient unto themselves when used independently, and will only be supplanted in their sphere of usefulness by improvements on their own mechanical construction.

A Box Office Viewpoint of the Motion Picture

By Robert Grau.

Perhaps the greatest and most constructive achievement of the motion picture has been the remarkable increase of theater goers—permanently created through the natural desire of the patrons of the picture theater to see in the flesh stage presentations to which hundreds of thousands of their patrons were wholly unfamiliar with.

It is not too much to say that in the United States alone the potency of the moving picture has resulted in the creation of fifteen million new theater-goers. Of this number perhaps one-half had never been inside of a regular theater, while the other half have repeatedly been provided with the incentive for theater-going which heretofore had been regarded as an annual luxury. This is so true that it is difficult to find a theatrical manager who does not regard the vogue of motion pictures as an asset. Moreover, the phonograph has been a vast influence in the same direction and it will perhaps surprise many to know that even the Metropolitan Opera House has been materially benefited, and the problem of presenting grand opera at a profit has been solved to a great extent through a desire on the part of thousands of persons, who had never heard a grand opera, but having heard the arias artificially reproduced as sung by the world's greatest vocal stars, have gradually found their way to the box office of the majestic Opera House at 40th Street and Broadway.

In Europe the evolution has been even more pronounced, especially in the Latin countries. An illustration is afforded in the City of Moscow, in Russia. Five years ago only the subsidized theater and opera house could attract an audience, whereas to-day there are sixty-five moving picture theaters, and these entertain each day in excess of 40,000 persons. This has resulted in a half dozen legitimate theaters finding a public created for them.

In New York City more than a quarter of a million persons enter daily, theaters where the motion picture is the compelling attraction. It is true that vaudeville is added in some of these, but the patronage was wholly created by the moving picture, and can only be maintained by retaining it as a vital part of the entertainment provided.

A careful observation of conditions prevailing throughout the country indicates that the vogue of the moving picture has the element of longevity to an extent one may well marvel at. A visit to a city not forty miles from the Grand Central Depot, having a population of fifty thousand persons, uncovered a most extraordinary status. This community five years ago had only three thousand less inhabitants, yet at that period there were but two places of amusement, and these offered serious problems for the managers who were intrepid enough to tempt fate with their management. To-day this city has five newly erected theaters—large and commodious, devoted to moving pictures, and these draw a combined daily attendance of twelve thousand persons, despite that there are a half dozen smaller houses wholly devoted to the camera man and which attract an additional daily attendance of at least 5,000. One would imagine then that the regular theater, if such could indeed be maintained, would fare ill—but it is a fact that two establishments where the scale of admission prices ranges from 25 cents to $1.50—are open nearly every night, large audiences are the rule, and the most amazing part of it all is that the galleries which would be mostly affected by the vogue of the cheaper houses are invariably crowded.

There are at least fifty cities between New York and Boston, where five years ago the one theater they each boasted of would be opened perhaps one day a week. The men who conducted these were content if they could pay the local expenses. Practically all of them are to-day moving picture theaters open every day, giving three or more performances, each twenty-four hours and paying an annual profit to each of their owners of from $8,000 to $20,000. But in this class of city the regular theater has disappeared. The public which was wont to patronize one day a week the visiting stars, now has to be content with the entertainment provided in the picture theater or else it must journey to the larger cities, such as Hartford, New Haven, Springfield, Worcester, etc., where the picture vogue has not yet resulted in a total obliteration of the higher priced playhouses.

In the city, where I happen to reside, Mount Vernon, N. Y., up to three years ago the one theater there available could not attract a paying house for any kind of stage offering. One manager after the other failed disastrously; the house was often dark for months at a time, and the thirty-five thousand persons who live there were compelled to go to the metropolis for their amusements. Three years ago Keith and Proctor leased a theater in Mount Vernon, N. Y., made it attractive in their own peculiar way and installed therein a picture machine, and invited the public to enter. It is no exaggeration to state that no week passes that two-thirds of the population does not visit this theater at least once. It is necessary to go as early as 6.30 p. m. in order to get a seat in the house, which has capacity for 1,700 persons. At 9 p. m. it is a common sight for more than one thousand persons to be seen standing in the lobbies and on the sidewalk, waiting for a chance to enter through an exodus of the seated audience. But the strangest thing of all is that in this city where three years ago there were no theater-goers, and despite the tremendous attendance at this and other picture theaters, there is now a well-equipped dramatic stock company presenting the best plays, the very latest New York successes and charging high prices of admission, yet playing to splendid audiences, although the same play is given throughout each week. Surely this is an amazing illustration of a condition created by the potency of the moving picture, for no one can deny that this patronage for fine plays is due to "the theater habit" contracted by families in the suburban city. Now they are confirmed theater-goers; want to see all that is going on in theaterdom. I would never have believed that such an evolution could take place in three years—if I were not a witness of the spectacle.

On East 14th Street where William Fox has made a fortune in the Dewey Theater, despite the almost prohibitive rental of $50,000 a year, it does not seem possible to maintain a theater in which the motion picture is not a vital part. Here we have the veritable stomach of the Greater City. Moreover, there is no indication that time or progress will ever change the character of this thoroughfare. Mr. Fox has two other theaters on 14th Street, the Academy of Music and the City Theater. The latter was built with a view to provide a modern playhouse for the best attractions. It did not prosper. Then Mr. Fox, not desiring to compete with his own (the Dewey) Theater, tried to present what is called high class vaudeville there, charging uptown prices, but the public would not go. In desperation, perhaps, because he had no alternative, Mr. Fox decided to run the City Theater along the same lines as that which is so successful at the Dewey. The two theaters practically adjoin each other, but what do you suppose happened? The beautiful and costly City Theater has had its problem solved. With moving pictures and minor vaudeville the tremendous patronage of the Dewey left an overflow great enough to fill to capacity another and still larger theater. Truly it is a wonderful illustration of a public knowing what it wants.

"Five Hours"

A "Rex" Gem.

Here is a charming little play, with clean-cut characters, carried through an ingenious intrigue and many interesting situations by an art that is beyond artificiality. A lot of young gentlemen of the leisure class get together at a Bohemian club in search of amusement, and one daring spirit among them furnishes it by falling headlong into a very bad scrape. It is pure comedy. No noble sorrow is depicted, no grand self-sacrifice, and there is no splendid sweep of emotion—just a sense of delight provoked by some captivating situations in a burglar play. There are one or two delicious pastels among the scenes in a woman's bedchamber, here and there some ludicrous incidents, and one cannot help feeling a sense of satisfaction throughout the performance because it is consistently good from beginning to end. There may be flaws in "Five Hours," but they do not thrust themselves upon the spectator.

Scene from "Five Hours"—Latest Rex Comedy.

The story begins with a maid reading a newspaper account of a diamond robbery and exhibiting alarm. There is not much opportunity for the maid in this opening scene, but she uses all there is of it to such advantage that the playlet starts off all right. We foresee fright if not consternation, when her much-bejeweled mistress enters the room in an evening gown to retire. At once it becomes plain that an admirable selection of types has been made, for the two women carry their roles out in a manner that has a great deal to do with the success of the comedy. Both fit their parts, or the parts fit them, to perfection. Here is where many directors fall down, especially in the use of stock companies. An over-featured actress appears in too many roles not to make the mistake of calling in some of them. The mistress presents an attractive picture in her becoming attire and conducts herself like a society woman not like an actress trying to attract attention. She presents a charming picture when the electric chandelier beneath a strong light streaming down from above her head, a pearl worth framing.

While mistress and maid are discussing the diamond robbery and preparing to hide the former's jewels, there is a conspiracy in progress at the Bohemian Club. The article pertaining to the diamond robbery comes under discussion, with a result that a wager is made by a reckless member. He agrees in writing to show up the professional cracksman, to enter any designated house, to get the goods and make his escape, returning in five hours. He starts forth on his dangerous errand with an escort to see that he does his crooked work on the level and the comedy is on.

Amusing and original scene is that before a city house when the escort designates a house of broad front steps and a parlor balcony with a cop, who looks like Frank Daniels, asleep at a lamp post directly in front. This happens to be the house in which the disrobing society lady and her maid are scheming to hide the former's jewels. The escort hides and the amateur, a gentlemanly looking Raffles in evening dress, starts in to open the front door with a skeleton key. Trouble begins, for the cop wakes up and catches him at the job. Raffles comes down the stairs with uncertain step and explains that there is something the matter with the keyhole. The cop understands, or thinks he does, and suggests ringing the bell. Raffles, feigning intoxication, indicates that he is not courting disaster by arousing the family. He must sneak in, but is so befuddled that he can not devise a way. The kind-hearted cop helps him out. "Try the window." Raffles congratulates the cop and actually climbs on the balcony with the policeman's assistance, thanking him profusely when he lifts the window. He enters and the cop returns to his nap.

We now see Raffles in cautious progress through the house and the society woman retiring in the usual series of scenes made attractive rather than thrilling, with no inkling of the comedy situations to come. The lady finally hides her magnificent jewels on the floor of a clothes closet, examines her revolver and goes to bed. The light is turned out and the bedroom is in total darkness. Aha! A round light appears on the blank scene, revealing bits of the interior on its wayward course. It comes from the bull's eye of Raffles. He is indeed an amateur. He turns up the light, awakens the sleeping beauty and finds himself looking into the dark little hole of a pistol. Both hands up, and unmasked, he is forced to turn his back to the bed while the lady makes some changes in her attire. To her lace-trimmed nightie she is adding a robe de chambre. He looks over his shoulder to see if she still has the pistol and sees we, no matter; she is putting on her slippers. The little comedy reminds one of those written by Eugene Scribe. The lady drives the dress-suit burglar at the point of the pistol to the hall and compels him to telephone for the police. The police arrive outside, and the sleeping cop wakes up to the fact that he has assisted a burglar to enter the house. While this is going on outside, the suave burglar uses all the eloquence at his command to save himself from the consequences of his rash act, explaining the bet and the whole situation. The beauty relents, and, to save the young gentleman, she conducts him back to her rooms and hides him in her closet. She then goes and wards off the police she has had summoned. She returns to the closet.

Crisis. Il n'est pas la! The interesting burglar has flown and taken with him the jewels she had in that very closet. Of course they are eventually restored, together with an addition paid her out of the bet won by the amateur cracksman, and the end is artistic.

A notable feature of this photoplay is the light. It comes from where it should come from. This is a most desirable feature in moving pictures; the high lights and shadows are so carefully admitted as to perfectly mold the figures, bringing them out in clear relief from the background. They are human beings, not photographs. The photographic segments of this release and its charm of surroundings make it a veritable gem.

Enthusiastic Meeting of New York Operators.

Gompers Addresses New York Operators.

At the fateful hour when graveyards yawn, Monday, March 21, Local Union No. 35, Auxiliary, Electric Moving Picture Operators, New York, did not come to order, but, instead, proceeded to have the time of its life. Beethoven Hall held something like 500 operators, the officers, members and guests of the union. Refreshments were served and the following splendid talent entertained the assemblage for an hour and a half: Ben Bernard, singer; Jack Gilbert, pianist; M. Krauss, pianist, and S. Gotzler, zylophone soloist.

The meeting was addressed by Samuel Gompers, president American Federation of Labor; Mr. Herman Robinson, commissioner of licenses for the City of New York; Mr. F. H. Richardson, editor Trouble Department, Moving Picture World; El De Costa and Robert Goldblatt, officers of the union, as well as by William D. Lang, president of the local.

Many applications for membership were received and the meeting was in every way a decided success. It marks the entry into the city of New York of a powerful and potent factor for good as concerns the profession of operating. It is to be hoped that the organization, in its efforts to better projection, and those who do the projecting, will be met in friendly spirit by the exhibitors meeting this new factor in any other way would be something else than wisdom. Organization is the order of the day. The operators intend asking nothing unreasonable. In fact, their demands, when made, will be conservative to a fault. Auxiliary Local Union No. 35 has been in existence for something like three years, but has, up to this time, been of questionable value. That state of affairs has passed. So thoroughly was Mr. Richardson impressed with the sudden change for the better that he heartily endorsed the movement in his address, announced his intention of severing all connection with the opeartors' school, of which he has been instructor, and amid demonstrations of approval made application for membership in the union. His advice to all operators is to get into the organization without delay. The meeting was pervaded by a spirit of harmony and on every hand the sentiment was voiced that all past differences be not only dropped but also forgotten. For two weeks the initiation fee is reduced to two dollars, after which it will be restored to five. It is your last chance to get in on reduced entrance fee. Filmless Animated Photography.

(From the Kinematograph & Lantern Weekly.)

In inviting a number of medical and moving picture experts to witness what the admission card described as "Filmless Kinematography," Captain Otto Fulton probably made his one mistake, for by it he led those who attended the demonstration of his invention to believe that they were to seen animated pictures projected without the aid of any film. Still, even this mistake may have had its compensating influences by arousing curiosity and inducing many who would not otherwise have gone, to visit his exhibition. True, films in the ordinarily understood meaning of the term, so far as the word can be taken to mean only the celluloid article, were not used, but no other description can be fitly applied to the strips used. Be that as it may, those who journeyed to Saville Row on Friday last were rewarded for their trouble by witnessing a really marvellous display, and one in which the results achieved would certainly seem to warrant the assertion that at any rate, the death knell of the magic lantern slide has at last been sounded.

Capt. Fulton, F.R.P.S., is better known in this country, perhaps, as the inventor of the Otto Fulton Process which, with stereoscopic effects depicting colored advertisements, has considerably added to the attractiveness of the front display at theaters.

His system of projection is not to throw the light through the picture to be projected, but at it, and by using reflectors, to thus throw the image through the lens, and on to the screen. By this means, colored picture-postcards were faithfully reproduced, and metallic shades, such as gold and silver, which have hitherto been impossible to depict on a screen, were reproduced for the first time.

The guests inserted in the machine sovereigns, bunches of keys, miniature photographs, butterflies, a bowl of living goldfish, match-boxes and watches, all of which appeared on the screen in a magnified form.

For moving pictures, opaque paper, specially prepared and rendered non-inflammable is used, and this is of such a texture as to be practically indestructible. That the invention had reached the commercial stage was not claimed by the inventor, and the demonstration clearly proved this, but there is a great deal in the discovery of a practical nature. That Captain Fulton is on the right road was never in doubt, and it will be surprising if, in a short space of time, the gallant captain's discovery does not find a place in the picture theater.

We have said it means the death knell to the lantern slide as we now know it, for who would be encumbered with a mass of glass slides, easily damaged, when printed postcards or views will suffice, to say nothing of the saving of labor in preparation and reduction in weight and consequent cost of carriage.

Nor is this all, for from a scientific point of view, Captain Futon's system opens up the greatest possibilities, especially in the direct, enlarged and instantaneous portrayal of normal and pathological material, for crude sections cut by hand with the knife are able to be immediately delineated on the screen, giving images enlarged at will, and in their natural colors without any previous preparation.

More than this we do not feel called upon to say at this juncture, but it certainly seems to us that Captain Fulton's invention is the germ of a great idea, and one which should ultimately win for him both fame and fortune.

The "Liberty Theatre," Los Angeles.

By Richard V. Spencer,
Coast Correspondent of the "World."

The "Liberty" is one of the city's eight first-class moving picture theaters. The selection of the theater site was chosen with exceptionally good judgment. The theater is located in the heart of the business district at 266-68 South Main Street, at the intersection of Third and Main Streets. The theater is of brick and plaster construction. The front facade is of stucco and plaster-covered brick, the paneling and cornices outlined in small electric lights at night. The gold leaf statue crowning the cornice is ten feet in height, and, symbolizing liberty, holds aloft an electric torch. At the base of the statue in a laurel leaf gilded shield is the date of erection, 1910. Below this, on the crown of the shell-shaped lobby ceiling, is a second shield in gold leaf with the theater name, "Liberty."

The floor of the lobby is of white tile, inlaid with a series of swastika design borders in green tile. The side walls of the lobby are wainscoted in white Italian marble to a height of eight feet, crowning which is a twelve inch moulded cap of mahogany. The entrance doors are of mahogany, their bases trimmed in brass, and their upper panels of plate glass, with the admission price in gold leaf on the glass. The box office is roomy. It is also wainscoted in marble, the woodwork of the upper part being in mahogany, and the windows of plate glass. The back wall of the lobby contains a beautiful beaded art glass window, semi-circular in shape, with a landscape design of beautiful coloring especially so when seen illuminated at night. Bordering the design are the words "Continuous Performance." Radiating from the art glass window, which forms the nucleus of the shell, are a series of stucco shell ribs, each containing fifteen clear-globed eight-candle power lights. The ceiling is decoarted in cream, the ribs being of light orange.

The inner lobby leading to the auditorium is 15x20 feet in size. The floor is of white tile, with a six-inch baseboard of marble. The lobby is paneled in oak to a height of 30 inches, above which it is covered with an imitation leather fabric. On each side of the lobby are spacious mirrors four by ten feet in size. The lobby is lighted by two ceiling dome lights in frosted globes. The lobby ceiling is decorated in cream, with a stenciled border in green. Opening off the lobby are retiring rooms for both men and women, the rooms also being finished in tile and marble. A narrow stairway opening off the lobby leads to the office, operators' room and organ loft.

The operators' booth is roomy and is equipped with the latest apparatus, including two Edengraph projectoscopes, and a stereopticon. To the right of the operator's balcony is the organ loft, containing a large pipe organ, a valuable addition to the orchestra in accompanying religious and special films.

The auditorium seats 540. The seats are of wood, with iron standards. The side walls of the auditorium are paneled to a heighth of three feet in oak, above which are a series of five landscape paintings on each side, the borders of which are outlined with stenciled designs of a darker shade than the light green color scheme of the side walls. The height of the auditorium is twenty-four feet, and the stage is sixteen feet square. Flanking the stage on each side are singing booths. The auditorium is illumined by ceiling lights, and ten pairs of art glass side lights of tulip design with green globes. The ceiling is of white plaster with cream trim, and from it are suspended five electric fans.

The theater is showing four first-run licensed films, and one illustrated song, except on Saturdays and Sundays, when two songs are used.

The theater employs ten people. Girl ushers look after the seating arrangements. Five cents admission is charged to all parts of the house.

The size of the theater is 32 x 145. Mr. A. C. Martin, of Los Angeles, was the architect, the construction contract going to P. J. Bolin.

Messrs. Kaiser, Sturm & Hughes are the proprietors. The theater was completed early in the year and has played to good business ever since.

A LARGE BUYER OF FILM.

London, February 25, 1911.

I had the pleasure of a chat today with Mr. H. Fisher, the English representative of Mr. Spencer of Australia. I learn that so great is the demand in the Antipodes for good films and so vastly has the quality of the product to be obtained in London improved that whereas twelve months ago Mr. Fisher was content to get hold of one pounds' worth of film per week, now he buys every week one pounds' worth. And, needless to say, a good proportion of that goes for the American article. Mr. Spencer now has, without doubt, the finest business "down under," due to no small extent to the great acumen displayed by Mr. Fisher as an buyer. After all it is the judicious buying that counts. Anyone can show a good film when it is bought for him. And Mr. Fisher is known to the trade as the fairest buyer to have to deal with. He has no time for dealers that cram slushy films to one absolutely overstuffed and then buys that which stands from, viewing from the public's standpoint, and not an exhibitor's point of view. Hence his and his employer's success.

Picture Personalities.

Eberhard Schneider.

One of the most interesting personalities in the moving picture business to-day is Eberhard Schneider. We publish his photograph herewith in the uniform of a Captain of the Naval Reserve. He began his career as a sailor, enlisting in the German navy, and was assigned to the gunboat Adler, which was detailed to Samoan waters, and remained there six years until the great typhoon of 1888 brought about an ending of an international quarrel then pending about the ownership of some islands of the Indian Archipelago. At this time Mr. Schneider was a consulting engineer on gun machinery. He fought in the battle of Vailele as a marine, against Mataafa, the rebel King of Samoa. Mr. Schneider is the sole living survivor of the great typhoon, and the experiences he went through during that awful week are enough to make one's hair stand on end. Nearly all of the men who were swept overboard in that storm, were immediately devoured by sharks, that infested the bay in thousands. He floated three days upon a yardarm, and, by keeping his feet out of water, escaped being devoured by the sharks.

But these experiences form a small part in the career of this very wonerful man. For he can truly be set down as a genius and the moving picture industry may be proud of having such a remarkable votary. Above all else Mr. Schneider is a scientist in the full sense of the word. He is qualified first of all as an optician. He is also an electrical engineer with the proper certifications. Besides these, he has passed as a chemist, but above all he is a mechanic, par excellence.

When we last visited Mr. Shneider, he had a small workshop and laboratory on Twelfth Street, New York City, therefore the surprise of our representative was very great when in going for an interview he found himself face to face with a five-story building, owned and occupied solely by Mr. Eberhard Schneider. From the moment of entering the doorway of this remarkable establishment, there were on all sides, evidences of the strong individuality of this industrious German. Whatever the eye rested upon was of the very best that money can buy. The polished brasswork, the clean floors, the tasty show cases, denoted that cleanliness for which the German people are noted. There we found Mr. Schneider attired in a very unconventional sweater, as he came forward with his broad smile of greeting. But the surprise of the exterior aspect, immediately faded into nothingness when compared with the surprises within. We were conducted to an upper floor, and first visited the projection room, which in itself is as large as some nickelodeons, and there was witnessed a demonstration of Mr. Schneider's single illuminant double dissolving stereopticon, or in other words, a dissolver with only one arc light, for both lenses. This is one of the most ingenious pieces of machinery that has ever been adapted to stereopticon work, and is absolutely practical in every way. It is an apparatus that every exhibitor should investigate without delay.

From the exhibition room a visit was made to the chemical laboratory, where Mr. Schneider does his experimental work in that branch of physics. Here, again, was cleanliness on every hand, which is also true of the entire establishment. From the laboratory we went into the developing room, which is a thoroughly equipped laboratory for the developing of trade films, constructed entirely along Mr. Schneider's own original plans. Passing down to the show-room floor there was to be seen on all sides moving picture supplies of every kind and description. There is nothing known to the moving picture industry that Mr. Schneider does not carry in stock. But the greater part of these are his own ingenious devices, and a very casual glance at any one of them, reveals the hand of the master mechanic. Back of the large showroom are Mr. Schneider's private offices, which are light, airy and sumptuously furnished. And then back of the offices is a large conservatory or private flower garden, which Mr. Schneider maintains for his own personal pleasure.

Passing below stairs to the mechanical department one is bewildered by the profusion of machinery. Machines of every kind and description. At one end we see the lens grinding department, for Mr. Schneider grinds his own lenses and condensers, and there are several hundred dies of all sizes and shapes in evidence. A few moments conversation with Mr. Schneider on the subject of lenses is enough to convince the ordinary interviewer that he has a lot to learn on the subject of optics. It is evident that Mr. Schneider knows this subject from the ground up. Then, as we turn away from the Optical Work Shop, we pass by all kinds of other machinery, and all of them the very best that money can buy. Each one of these machines has its own individual motor, and we counted twenty of them at the very least. On all sides are moving picture machines in the process of construction, and it was not until we reached this machine shop that we realized what a thorough-going moving picture plant it is. Everything is made on the premises, and very little comes in from the outside, except raw stock.

There is a wood-working shop, and further down into the sub-cellar, there is a nickel-plating plant, as well as gold and silver-plating apparatus. All the power for the establishment is generated on the premises and there is every kind of current from 10 to 500 volts scattered about the premises.

There is also a steam heating plant in the sub-cellar and a systematic stock room which requires the services of a special employee to look after that branch alone. To give the reader an idea of the thoroughness of this plant, we will touch upon a few of the articles which are manufactured there. First of all we shall mention the Mirror Vitae projection machine, which is now built in combination with the single illuminant double dissolving stereopticon; this means a moving picture machine and dissolving stereopticon operated with but one arc light, and in view of the great saving of current thereby, the machine is worth any price Mr. Schneider might choose to ask for it. Besides the Mirror Vitae projector, there is also manufactured the Mirror Vitae non-infringing camera, also tripods, film printers, perforators, measures, rewinders, rheostats, star wheels, film developing tanks, film drying drums and in short every device from the making of a film to its projection on a screen. The amount of things to be seen on every hand is positively bewildering. Besides all of these, on the roof there is a studio, for the taking of moving pictures. The halls and stairways are heavily carpeted. There is an atmosphere of elegance everywhere. On each floor there are lavatories for guests and employees. Beyond a doubt this is a most remarkable moving picture supply house in the world, and its guilding spirit is a true genius. It has been said that a genius is a man who finds out new ways of doing things, and this description exactly fits Mr. Schneider. He has been established in his new place since last October and the greater part of that time has been spent in putting the building into the condition in which we found it. But now that it is done, or nearly done, we may expect the Mirror Vitae products to come to the front with rapid strides and quickly gain the reputation that their merits deserve.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

Fourteenth Street continues to increase in popularity as the center of the film exchange and song slide business. The Novelty Film Exchange, C. B. Purdy, manager, is just moving into new quarters at 20 East Fourteenth Street, New York City. Mr. Purdy moves down from East Twenty-Third Street, where he was located for a considerable time, and his old friends will be pleased to find him at a more central location.

The Novelty Slide Company are also locating at the same address, in fine, large new quarters.

CHAMPION TO USE EASTMAN FILM.

Mr. Dintenfass, of the Champion Film Company, advises that, commencing March 20th, they will positively make all releases on Eastman film exclusively. He has just signed a year's contract and feels as frisky as the proverbial March hare in making the above announcement, as it means that there will be no further cause for complaint in regard to "Champ" films in this respect.

London Letter.

The great event in the Moving Picture World this week has been the production of Henry VIII with Sir H. Beerbohn Tree as Cardinal Wolseley, Mr. Arthur Bourchier in the name part, and Miss Violet Vanbrugh as Queen Katherine, and Miss Laura Cowie as Anne Boleyn. Words fail one to adequately describe this great triumph of the kinematographers' art. The picture is without doubt the greatest that has ever been attempted in this country, and I am almost tempted to say in any other. As a histrionic subject it is an artistic triumph. In it we have the best of dramatic talent, and consequently the acting passes anything ever seen in moving pictures before. Mr. Will Barker, in inducing Sir H. Tree to allow his company from His Majesty's Theater to be filmed, has placed kinematography under an obligation, to him which it will be hard to repay. The effect on the moving picture industry here will be enormous.

The picture was presented at a special matinee at the Palace Theater on Friday at which the whole of Sir Henry Tree's company were present. Aided by the orchestra of His Majesty's Theater as well as by the chorus, additional beauty was lent to the effort and the audience, as vast in numbers as it was representative of all phases of the industry, went into rapturous cors over the production was, I understand, nothing short of three thousand pounds and, as only ten films are to be released for London and a similar number for the provinces with a few for abroad, the return to Friend Barker will not be very great, especially as the films at the end of five weeks are to be returned to Sir H. Tree, together with the negative. Still Barker in filming the picture had another motive than money-making. His chief aim was to enable him to hand down to posterity a faithful, silent and permanent record of the wonderful life-like portrayal and representation of some of the most important personages and incidents in the eventful history of England. It is the first permanent record of the great English actors' art. Garrick, Kean, Phelps, Kemble and Mrs. Siddons, to mention only a few, are but names, even in the minds of the English people. Tree, Bourchier and Vanbrugh will, by means of kinematography, live for all time in this wonderful representation of their art.

I learn that America will early opportunity of seeing this fine picture and I venture to predict for it a success in your country. As an example of what the English producer is capable of turning out, it should do us a bit of good, whilst as an educator for picture performers its value cannot be over-estimated. I am quite aware that in your own country the silent drama has come on a great headway in recent years, but without being considered to favor my own land unduly, I think I can say that none of your films, even those of the best known dramatic producers can hold a candle to the acting to be found in this film. But then, in the words of a celebrated parliamentarian, perhaps your readers will prefer to "Wait and see."

The annual Kinematograph Trade Dinner came off last week and was a gigantic success. It gave strong evidence of the growth of pictures in this country. Whereas three years ago when the first trade dinner was held barely forty guests sat down—last year there were about two hundred—on this occasion over three hundred and fifty were present and if the trade grows in the future as it has done in the past, a difficulty will soon be experienced in finding a hotel with a room large enough to accommodate the trade dinner. One of the most noticeable features was the fact that America is playing a large part in that growth. I noticed that a very considerable proportion of those present hailed from your country.

A multitude of matters of interest to the trade were discussed after dinner, and it was apparent that the producer and renter are entertaining the idea that the exhibitor is the man who is reaping the greatest benefit. I should not be surprised, therefore, if at no distant date matters are made a little more difficult for that individual. The remedy would be to raise the standard price charged for films by the producers. Then the renter would have to raise his charge accordingly and he would get an opportunity to put on a little more than he was charged by the manufacturer, and thus a salient levelling up all round could be effected.

Some very good films are being released here now. One of the best is that of the Clarendon Film Company, which is running a Lieutenant Rose series. The subject of their next picture is "Lieutenant Rose and the Boxers." It is just the sort of picture that I should think your people would like, full of excitement and originality, splendidly acted and of fine photographic quality. The Clarendon Company are in England what the Vitagraph Company is in America. Look out for their stuff, it is good.

From Berlin comes news of a new development in the trade. Berlin's millionaires who throng the leafy Tiergarten quarter, have found in the cinematograph, a new consolation for the miseries of wealth. The latest fashion is to have one's domestic joys, such as marriages and christenings, cinematographed, and the films presented to friends. This implies the possession of a projector, and they are being sold in enormous numbers. Cinematograph parties are given in smart salons, and surprises are a prominent feature. A guest sees on the screen a secretly taken record of himself walking in the park and intense amusement is caused by this movement for leisured study of one's friends. A wedding that took place last week was filmed from beginning to end including the drive to church and back to the bride's house. Copies of the films were sent to relatives of the family in China, Australia, India, Japan and elsewhere.

There is no doubt that oral explanations help the picture immensely. Some of the plots employed are far too involved to be readily followed by the average picture habituee. For, after all, the moving picture being a cheap form of amusement, has hitherto appealed more to the lower or middle classes than to the upper crust, although, thanks to the great uplifting and the establishment of theaters where higher charges of admission prevail, the aristocracy are now being interested, as witness the fact that at one theater in the West End last week three royalties were present at one time.

And this leads me to another point. Over here charges of admission vary from one penny to a shilling, and there are some who are even thinking that the modest nickel is too much and are introducing half-price admission at half-time where the "two-houses-a-night" system is in vogue. What would your exhibitors say to admission at one half-penny?

The moving picture is slowly but surely asserting itself on the regular stage here. In the new revue, "By George," produced at the Empire the other night, it plays an important part. After the audience has been diverted with some clever impersonations of popular favorites outside the stage door of the Odoleum, the scene suddenly changes to a well known Turkish bath in Jermyn Street, where an artist who is having a warm time, realizing that he ought to be making up for his part instead of cooling down on a divan, swathes himself in a huge wrap and rushes out and to the Empire Theater, rounds the promenade down to the stalls and over the orchestra and footlights and off at the side to his dressing room, reappearing without a moment's wait in the "Chocolate Soldier." Needless to say the novelty of the whole proceeding elicits thunders of applause, though few Empire patrons have an inkling that they are merely looking at animated pictures.

This is, of course, not the first time that the kinematograph has been utilized on the stage. Last year there was quite an epidemic in that direction and the effect was so good that it is a wonder that more have not followed the example then set. Still the moving picture is coming into its own and certainly makes a possible in the limited stage space at the disposal of some of the smaller theaters such effects as, without it, they would be incapable of introducing, and, as this all makes for the good of the industry, none will cavil at that.

Picture theater proprietors who conduct lotteries as an inducement to patrons to visit their shows are having a warm time in England. All over the country prosecutions are being instituted and fines ranging from twenty pounds downward are imposed. The gaming laws in this country are so framed that nothing approaching what is allowed in your land would be tolerated for an instant here. In England if the moving picture exhibition is a success it is through its own merit, and not by the aid of bribes to those to whom "something for nothing" is so dear.

A showman has been proceeded against for exhibiting Pathe's "Elephant Hunting," the police characterizing it as an obscene film. It depicted the charging of the sprite in which several natives were seen in a semi-nude state. Some prudes at Burnley saw the picture and smelt evil in it, but the magistrates who had the picture projected for their special delectation thought otherwise and dismissed the case. It is a pity they did not mulct the prosecutor in the other side's costs. There is renewed agitation amongst some persons for the appointment of a censor of film plots and these prosecutions are believed to be taken at the instigation of persons desiring a censorship. Cold comfort must be the result of the case referred to.

New England Notes.

Representative Quinn of Swampscott, Mass., presented a bill for the consideration of the Massachusetts legislature on Thursday, March 16. The proposed bill is to prohibit managers of theaters, moving picture houses and all other places of amusement from discriminating in any way against persons wearing the uniforms of the United States navy or army. The bill is now being considered by the committee on rules. Moving picture houses formerly had some difficulty on this question, arising from the fact that soldiers and sailors would arise from their seats during the playing of our national airs and remain standing until this patriotic music had ceased. This would obstruct the view of those behind, and, consequently, some trouble and annoyance would arise. M. P. managers have gotten around this difficulty by not playing the national anthems in full. Instead they play bits of the airs. In this way patriotic pictures are handled in a satisfactory manner, and soldiers and sailors happening to be present do not feel called upon to arise out of respect, as the national anthems are not being given, strictly speaking.

As to the statement that the theater managers do not welcome Uncle Sam's soldiers and sailors while in uniform, it can easily be stated that any M. P. house is happy to secure their patronage, and considers them just as they do civilians.

Mr. Walter Preston was called to Yarmouth, N. S., on Tuesday, March 14, to attend the funeral of his mother, who died suddenly in that city. Mr. Preston is well known in M. P. circles through his connection with the firm of McCune & Cahill and the W. B. Cross enterprises of Brockton, New Bedford and Newport.

The Pastime Theater, Quincy Adams, Mass., which was recently closed for using vaudeville contrary to its license, will reopen on Easter Monday, if present plans are perfected.

It has been rumored lately that Mr. Frank Howard, who formerly owned one of the largest licensed film exchanges in the New England States which he sold to the General Film Company, is going to return to the M. P. business again. Whether these rumors are correct cannot be ascertained. Should Mr. Howard return to the business, he will be an important factor. The fact that two new organizations have announced themselves recently in the World, as about to produce and rent pictures, may account for the rumors. Without any exceptions, Mr. Howard was the most popular film exchange man in the New England States, and, at any time can command a large following to whatever organization he connects himself.

The Palace Theater, Fall River, Mass., exhibited the "Passion Play" during the week of March 13, and Manager Graham found the reels to be excellent attraction for use during Lent. Although it has been under the control of Mr. George Graham less than two months, the Palace is showing the results of the new hand at the wheel. Since the house was taken over by Mr. Graham from its former owner, Mr. William Steeker, improvements have been noticed, and business at the Palace is considerably more brisk under Mr. Graham than ever before in its history.

The Penny Arcade, Lynn, Mass., is doing a nice business with M. P. and illustrated songs. No vaudeville being used.

Boston.

Mr. Frank L. Browne, who in the past has managed four Boston M. P. theaters, the Pastime, Beacon, Old South and New Washington, is now managing vaudeville acts playing the M. P. theaters rather than the theaters themselves, and has established an office at 74 Boylston Street, Boston.

The bursting of a water pipe delayed the opening of the Star Theater, Tremont Row, almost an hour on St. Patrick's day, March 17. The damage was slight, and no very serious inconvenience arose.

Buffalo Jones (Col. C. J. Jones) will deliver his lecture on "Lassoing Wild Animals in Africa," in Jordan Hall, Boston, Monday, March 27, at 3:30 p. m., for the benefit of the Dedham Temporary Home. This lecture by Buffalo Jones, in connection with his M. P., will probably be one of the most expensive M. P. entertainments ever offered in Boston, as the prices are $1 and $1.50. As it is given for a charitable purpose a high class and wealthy audience is expected. Such an interesting speaker as Buffalo Jones, together with such fine moving pictures as are the reels on which he will lecture, will no doubt make an excellent impression on the audiences, and should be a point in favor of M. P. for local purposes.

Lent is having practically no effect on the business of the local M. P. theaters, and managers are reporting trade "about the same as usual."

Los Angeles Notes.

By Richard V. Spencer.

Going East.—Mr. Adam Kessel, president of the New York Motion Picture Company, and Mr. Fred J. Balshofer, director of the Bison Company, have left for the East on business. They will not go direct, but will make brief visits to San Francisco, Denver and Chicago, where they will investigate exchange situations having a bearing on independent films. Mr. Balshofer expects to be gone about a month. During his absence the local studio will be under the management of Mr. Montgomery, the assistant director. Upon the return of Mr. Balshofer active work is scheduled to begin on the new Bison studio buildings. When finally completed the Bison studio will be one of the largest and most complete on the Pacific Coast. With the completion of the new studio, the company will put two stock companies to work, one to continue with the popular Bison Indian and Western films, and the other to produce modern drama and comedy.

Selig.—Mr. Hobart Bosworth, leading man and assistant director of the Selig Company, has returned from a trip to the Yosemite Valley. The return trip proved a hazardous journey. While in the valley Mr. Bosworth encountered a terrific blizzard, which before it ended, succeeded in doing considerable damage. The big snow fall put the valley railroad out of commission and left the director and the members of the company with him, snowbound and stranded when they were needed at home. With the aid of a handcar the company made their way out of the valley over ruined bridges to the Southern Pacific main line where they caught a train for Los Angeles.

Three a Week.—The recent unusual weather conditions have caused the companies working here to throw on the high speed clutch and produce three films a week. Perfect photography weather is now the rule and not the exception, and this happy state of affairs will continue until next December. Last week the Biograph Company took several scenes in the rain. The Mojave Mountains near Santa Monica are beginning to rival Griffith Park as a rendezvous for local producers. The Biograph had one of their companies there working last week, and this week the Pathe Company are there in force working on Indian and Western pictures. This beautiful stretch of broken foothill and mountain land has also been photographed by the Bison Company. Part of it faces the ocean and it is here that such famous pictures as "The Unchanging Sea" (Biograph), "The Padre," "A Tale of the Sea," "The Buccaneers" (Selig), were produced.

New Producer.—The California Motion Picture Company is soon to enter the independent producing field. This company must not be confused with the California Motion Picture Manufacturing Company, which is a separate and distinct corporation. The new company is under the direction and ownership of Mr. Fred Siegert. Mr. Siegert was the owner and organizer of the Los Angeles Film Exchange, later selling out the exchange to engage in the exhibiting field. He then purchased the lease of the American Theater at Fifth and Broadway, and afterward sold out to turn his attention to the producing end of the motion picture field. Mr. Siegert's representative informed the writer that he already has a number of completed negatives on hand, produced at his temporary studio on West Jefferson Street, and that he has a market for twenty prints. The director of the new company is Major McGuire, who is said to have directed for Eastern companies. Around him he has gathered a competent stock company for the production of straight dramatic and comedy subjects. A block of ground has been secured at Third and Figueroa streets,, and the studio is now in course of erection. When the studio is completed it is the intention of Mr. Siegert to place two stock companies in the field and to release two reels weekly. Mr. Siegert has not, as yet, announced whether he will market through the Sales Company, or through the new company, the National Film Manufacturers' Association.

Local Producers Censorship?—The recent Kalem film, "The Filibusters," has stirred up a local hornets' nest. The film was a forerunner of a series planned of the Mexican Revolution. Objections to the film have been pouring into the district attorney's office ever since its release. Most of the objections, it is hinted, have come through the influence of the Mexican Consul. Another rumor is to the effect that the district attorney is acting upon secret orders from Washington to discourage the making of films having for a subject the Mexican Revolution on the ground that the film stories are seditious to the interests of the Mexican government. The International Labor Agency, at 419 North Main Street, had twenty-five Mexicans at Glendale last week posing for the Kalem Company, and the Pathe Company at Santa Monica Canyon are said to be using a greater number in the production of war films. District Attorney Fredericks yesterday said that rigid censorship will be exercised on all moving picture films dealing with the Mexican Revolution. Labor agencies have been requested to discontinue supplying men for this work. The writer saw the film in question and in it saw nothing objectionable and much that was commendable. In the first place there was no bloodshed and brutality as alleged. The story was unusual and interesting and very well acted and directed. At this writing the local government court officials and attorneys have taken no action in the matter. If objections are to be raised to such films, the objections should come from government officials, who are most concerned, and not from county officials, who are exceeding their authority in interfering with a legitimate industry the individuals composing which have broken no laws.

Among the Exhibitors.

Bijou Goes Independent.—The Bijou Theater, Main Street, between Fifth and Sixth streets, under the management of L. M. Dull, has changed from licensed service to independent. The house has been using licensed service ever since it was built, and the sudden change has occasioned much surprise among local exhibitors. The theater is now using four first-run independent releases secured from Miles Brothers' new local exchange.

Policemen Exonerated.—Following a trial, the charges of misconduct preferred against Patrolmen A. F. Pfahler and L. N. Edwards of the East Side Police Station, were dismissed by the police commission who heard the evidence recently. The officers were accused of using undue force in ejecting three unruly boys from a North Broadway moving picture theater. The affair caused much bitterness and threatened to turn the neighborhood into hostile camps as a result of the controversy.

State Censorship.—The California Senate at Sacramento on March 8th passed the Strowbridge bill for the regulation of moving picture shows, 23 to 10. The chief provision of the bill is to protect children and young girls from alleged evils that abound in some of the nickelodeons. It provides that enough light shall be maintained while the show is running so that the face of everyone in the auditorium can be plainly seen. Also, that children under sixteen, unaccompanied, cannot attend shows after 8 p. m., in the winter months, and 9 p. m. in the summer months. It is said that the bill will work a hardship on exhibitors, in being necessary in most instances to replace the present screens with those of a mirrored nature.

New Independent Exchange.—Miles Brothers, operators of the big San Francisco independent exchange of that name, have established a Los Angeles exchange at 411 West Eighth Street, where they announce to exhibitors, the latest independent releases may be had, also projection machines and accessories. The local branch of Miles Brothers is under the management of Mr. Fred C. Dawes, an old-time exchange man, who formerly ran a Los Angeles exchange. Mr. Dawes organized the Los Angeles Operators' Union, and is the ex-president of that body.

Chinese Protest.—The Chinese of the coast are much disturbed over the production of the film, entitled: "The Chinese Trunk Mystery." The play is said to be based on the murder of Elsie Siegel, a missionary, by a Chinese Bible student in New York City. At the request of the Chinese Consul at San Francisco, the management of the Isis, San Diego, have cancelled the contract to show the film. Protesting that the display of the pictures would be a reflection on the character of members of their race, several prominent Chinese residents of the Los Angeles colony called on Chief of Police Sebastian and asked his co-operation to prevent the showing of the film. The chief promised the delegation that he would prevent the showing of the film itself if he found it to be improper. The local Chinatown has been flooded with yellow posters advertising the show at a local theater.

Theaters Dark.—A break in the electric power line at Saticoy, where the wires cross the Santa Clara River, recently deprived the city of Santa Barbara of electric current, and forced the closing of the theaters. "The Chinatown Trunk Mystery" film was to have been one of the picture show attractions, but could not be shown owing to the lack of current.

More Censorship.—Proprietors of moving picture theaters will be given an opportunity to be heard before the legislative committee of the City Council, next Saturday (March 18th) at 9 A. M., on the proposed ordinance regulating their places of business. As told in last week's issue of the "World" the advocates are the Los Angeles Civic Association, composed for the most part of church people. Advocates of the measure, which provides for a censorship of all pictures before they are shown, by an advisory committee selected by different city officials, boards and civic bodies, appeared before the committee on the 11th and presented their arguments. Before taking any action, however, the legislative committee of the council wanted to hear the exhibitors' side of the question and postponed further consideration until the morning of the 18th, where the question will be thrashed out in open session, allowing the picture men to be heard. Meantime the council committee will confer with the police department and endeavor to obtain more light on the subject. Many local exhibitors and exchange men will be present to combat any prejudicial action, and will try and interest the local producers and have them and their attorneys present at the session.

Operators' Schools.—Los Angeles boasts three schools for moving picture operators. Each has a good membership of students. Each school is under the management and instruction of capable and experienced men. Different makes of projection machines and parts are explained and used and the embryo operator is trained to project steady pictures and repair promptly any of the many kinds of breakdowns liable to occur in the progress of his duty. Los Angeles projection among the cheaper houses has progressed wonderfully within the past year, but whether it is due to the schools, or not, is problematical.

In the Mississippi Valley.

Moving Pictures as Evidence.—Court evidence in the form of moving pictures was introduced into the court of Judge Homer at St. Louis in order that a jury might determine the liability of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad for the death of a man named Powell. The machine was operated from the sheriff's desk and a quarter of a mile of right-of-way near the scene of the accident was thrown on the screen before the jurors. The picture was taken by the Commercial Film Manufacturing Company at the instance of the railroad which contends that Powell could have walked at either side of the track instead of in the middle when he was killed. The views were taken from the front end of a moving flat car.

Theater has Ball Team.—The Main Street Theater, Edwardsville, Ill., a picture house, supports a uniformed baseball team.

Well Known Operator Dead.—Harvey J. Guppy, 27 years old, operator at the Cozy moving picture theater in Lincoln, Ill., died March 11 at his home.

Afraid of Helping Trust.—Clauses prohibiting moving picture theaters in one-story frame buildings and requiring operators to procure licenses from the state board of electricity were stricken from the revisions in the building laws of Minneapolis, Minn. "I don't know whether I'm a trust-buster," said Alderman Martin P. McHuery, responsible for the eliminations, "but I understand there is a moving picture organization that is making trouble for the small independent theaters. I saw a theater closed one night because a 'spunky' operator refused to work and learned afterward he had been influenced by a film renter who had trouble with the manager. I don't believe in giving such operators any protection through a license."

Peoria, Ill.—Quiet greens relieved by gold tracery, gold-embroidered velour draperies, deep, soft carpets in foyer and aisles, with cement floors, cement stage and fireproof booth are announced as features of the new Lyceum Theater, Fulton Street, Peoria, Ill.

Dr. Rex Sholl, city health commissioner of Peoria, Ill., every new and then connected with a crusade of fluctuating volume is making a sweeping investigation of moving picture theaters of that city, according to the press which chronicles his avowals.

New Corporations.—The Empress Amusement Company, of St. Louis, Mo., has been incorporated with capital stock of $50,000 to operate theaters, moving picture shows, etc. The incorporators are Joseph F. Sippy, C. F. and N. F. Helb, W. J. Kiely and H. R. Fisher.

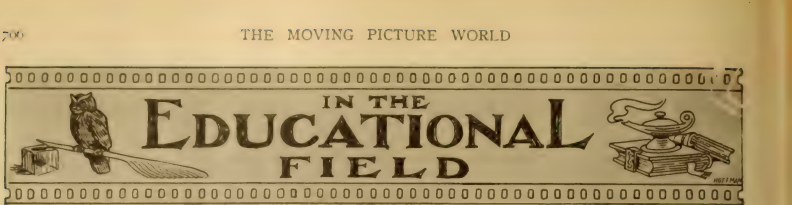
The Columbia Amusement Company, of Kansas City, Mo., has been incorporated with capital stock of $5,000. The incorporators are G. H. and E. G. Wiley and Alexander Calvert.

Theater Proprietor Dead.—Charles S. Gilbert, proprietor of the Star moving picture theater at Rockford, Ill., died March 13 at his home in that city.

Changes in the Field.—W. E. McKinney, of Pontiac, Ill., has sold the Cozy Theater, a photoplay house to M. E. Gardner, of Pennsylvania.

McPherson Brothers have opened the Picto Theater at Litchfield, Ill., which will be a five and ten cent house. Miss Ella Smith is pianist and C. A. McPherson is soloist.

F. H. M.



The problem of the children and the moving picture has yet to be solved; the law excluding minors unaccompanied by guardians is a crude necessity, born of conditions brought about by the early abuses of the "show." Time will radically and effectually alter all these things and a proper adjustment will result. It is conceded by all kinds of authorities that the interests of children will dominate the future of the cinematograph; while older people will appreciate and enjoy its educational aspects, it will to them be more a source of pleasure than anything else. With the children, however, the cinematograph is going to be an everlasting companion, instructor and pleasure-giver; entering into their lives so thoroughly that all laws relating thereto will be for the purpose of bringing them closer together in a proper manner, with conditions and environments of such a nature that shall make them sane and safe.

That father who writes to the Moving Picture World expressing his willingness to allow his children to go unaccompanied to the moving picture, is not alone by many thousands. To all such there should come this assurance that irksome conditions will soon be outgrown. The moving pictures are passing into the hands of people whose future interests are bound up in everything that is best. While, on the other side, laws and by-laws everywhere are being made in the interest (not of the grown-ups but) of the children. The most perfect freedom and highest objectives are the children's demands; these will be met by all further legislation. Let it be remembered that the more civilized a people become the greater number of laws are necessary to govern them; likewise as the moving picture becomes more powerful more and better regulations shall control it. In these the interests of the children will predominate.

No mechanical contrivance or synchronized phonograph, but the human voice; that is the voice to have with the picture.

The writer has recently been able to attend a number of picture lectures; to say that they were successful is but feebly to describe the results. A phonograph might be successful, and yet fall short of doing that good and producing those results, which alone can follow the vitality of the living voice. The first, the most important, indeed, the most noticeable result, was the almost electrifying effects upon the audience; attention was close, interest was intense, applause was constant and emphatic.

It was especially interesting to note the possibility of the lecturer to synchronize his words with the picture where occasion required; while much of the lecture must necessarily be descriptive, there were many occasions when the words of the speaker and the lips of the actor were in agreement; so that it almost seemed as if the very words were photographed. Upon a test it has been proved that upon those nights when the lecturer has been advertised to appear, the crowds have been greater; making it possible to pay the lecturer a respectable fee as well as increasing the profits; to say nothing of that to which in these columns we are most desirous, i. e., the greater development and higher and better uses of the moving picture.

Much has been written at various times concerning the evil of the picture, and, while much has also been written defending and protecting the picture from its calumniators, yet it appears that a positive review of the good of the picture needs to be forthcoming. No one who is well acquainted with the work and surroundings of the picture, whether in city, suburbs or town, can fail to have noticed its effects, as contrasted with the effects which result, or would have resulted from some other form of public amusement. The average theater brings with it the bar and the cigar, or at least it is planned that the hotel, saloon and cigar store shall not be "a mile away."

The moving picture place, however, can be installed in the most select residential neighborhood without any thought, suggestion or need for either the bar or the cigar. Again, the attitude of the public mind towards the picture is a correct guage as to its value. The other day a prominent authority compared the picture to the public press, referring of course, to its powerful facilities for imparting knowledge. The writer of the words takes that comparison for the purpose of showing that there is a "yellow" picture which is parallel with the "yellow journal," and that both exist only because of that section of the public mind that can feed upon such tainted food. Upon the whole, however, the respectable public, the respectable press and the respectable picture go together; it is believable, also, that they are in the ever-increasing majority.

The attitude of moral teachers and authorities has undergone a great change towards the value of the "good of the picture." No religious body has a prohibition against the picture, as it has even against the dance hall or the theater; and (while avoiding the ethics of Sunday amusements) it must be acknowledged that the picture place is less productive of evil than the theater and music hall on the Sabbath day; further, there is no doubt that time will develop a great moral advance in Sunday moving picture work.

The moving picture has done much good in driving out the cheap theater, the noisy music hall and the vicious, cheap attractions of various kinds, which always infested the crowded parts of the cities and the holiday resorts. In the great advantage thus gained, it is incumbent upon the "man behind the picture," in that he has got possession of the ground, to use it and hold it to the best advantage, with a view to permanency. In another aspect the picture has improved the theater of the better class, by taking away from it the need to cheapen itself at the cost of moral strength. In taking the place of the cheap and poor theater, the moving picture has provided a clean entertainment for the poorer classes and left the real theater free to do its own larger and artistic work; it may also be said that in this latter realm the moving picture will run its prototype a close race.

The only voice of complaint to be heard in the land is the howl of a small crowd of mediocre actors, capable only of filling questionable parts in pandering to a formerly vicious taste; who are now thrown out of employment.

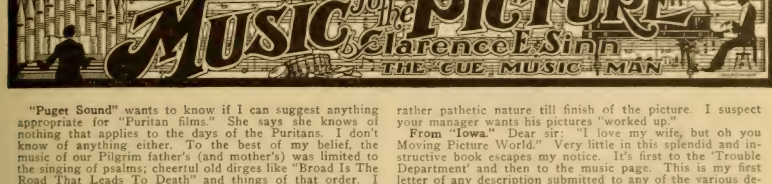
The greatest "good of the picture" is its unlimited usefulness, applied in any direction it responds accordingly. There is no human or natural resource in all the universe in which it cannot penetrate; bringing any length, depth or height within the range of one room and one vision.

FILM.

Early in January we were favored with an advance view of a very remarkable scientific film in the Pathe exhibition room, the notice of which was given on page 86 of our issue of January 14th. This week we were again invited to view the completed film in company with several members of the medical fraternity. The film shows, in a most convincing manner, the danger in drinking water from stagnant pools. The Pathe people have purposely postponed the release until the middle of April so that its great educational value will be turned to good account. The millions who see the magnified bacilli on the screen between now and vacation time will go with parched throats rather than quench their thirst at any pool, no matter how clear the water may appear to the eye. "Perfectly splendid" was the verdict of the doctors present. "We hope to see many more subjects of this nature taught through the medium of the motion picture."

We learn that one of the studios of the Pathe plant in Paris has been especially equipped for microscopical and medical work, and that the most eminent surgeons in France are performing operations under the eye of the camera. The films will be used for clinical lectures.



"Puget Sound" wants to know if I can suggest anything appropriate for "Puritan films." She says she knows of nothing that applies to the days of the Puritans. I don't know of anything either. To the best of my belief, the music of our Pilgrim father's (and mother's) was limited to the singing of psalms; cheertul old dirges like "Broad Is The Road That Leads To Death" and things of that order. I have one or two of those peculiar old hymns written in the ancient "Dorian Mode" with it's odd minor scale. They are probably valuable in an archaic sense, but if you undertook to use them in a picture show I doubt if anyone would know what you were trying to suggest. They could only be used in religious scenes anyway, and any good "religioso" would answer the purpose in such cases. Now, I have had neither time nor opportunity to look this matter up, but I am under the impression that the Puritans did not countenance instrumental music of any kind nor any tunes that were not of a religious character. I may be wrong in this, but even so, the purpose of picture music is purely suggestive in its nature and though one might go to endless pains in procuring music which is chronologically correct, unless it conveys a definite idea to his audience he has had his trouble for nothing. I speak of course of the audience of average intelligence. I don't believe one person in a thousand would know a Puritan tune if he heard it. The correspondent is evidently of a painstaking nature and I wish I could give her a more satisfactory answer. My plan would be to work such pictures as you would any drama, that is, play to the situations and characters. Avoid waltzes, as they are too modern in suggestion, and are not in keeping with the character of the Puritan who abhorred dancing. The waltz lento does not convey an idea of dancing, if it be played in a slow swinging style, and may be used where the scene permits. Many gavottes are neutral in character (unless the rhythm is very pronounced, like a schottish). The Puirtan pictures I have seen were of a tragic nature and called for much agitato, mysterious, heavy and plaintive music. Sometimes Indians are introduced which gives you a chance to vary your melodic coloring.

Mrs. F. —— writes: "It would be a great favor to me if you would let me know who is in the right, my manager or myself. He says he does not like my music to the pictures I play as follows: Waltzes, to drama. Opera, to classical pictures. Marches and two-steps, to comedy. Indian dance, to Indian picture. Rag time, to comic. Of course I shade music where it is needed."

I thought I had fairly covered this ground long ago, but it seems I have not made myself sufficiently clear to all. First and foremost, I advocate playing appropriate music, whatever the nature of the picture. A dramatic picture calls for dramatic music—that is, music of a descriptive character for its various scenes. If the scene is pathetic, play pathetic music. If the scene is gay, play something lively. If danger threatens, your music is mysterious. For combats, use "hurry's." Scenes of an agitated nature require music of a like character. Waltzes, intermezzos, etc., are useful for "fill-in" purposes; that is, where the scene is neutral in character and does not call for pronounced descriptive music. Classical pitures often work up like the dramatic; indeed, the most of them are dramatic, so far as I have observed. Comedies can often be worked up also as some correspondents have demonstrated in this page. These pictures are usually of a lively nature, however, and require lively snappy music and the march and two-step answers the purpose admirably. The Vitagraph release "Red Eagle" calls for something beside Indian dances, though it is an Indian picture. For the opening scene of the eagle's nest, I should suggest something of a grandioso type, about 8 bars 4-4 time until scene changes. Then slow Indian music until the medicine man dances, when it should change to faster Indian music; something like a war dance. Then back to your slow music again until the renegade is seen creeping up behind the tent, when your music changes to mysterious. Later on he abducts the squaw, and here you want an agitato, softly until he seizes her, then loud until he carries her away. This is continued piano and forte according as the action is fast or slow, until her chief joins her at the foot of the cliff, then Indian music of a slow, rather pathetic nature till finish of the picture. I suspect your manager wants his pictures "worked up."

From "Iowa." Dear sir: "I love my wife, but oh you Moving Picture World." Very little in this splendid and instructive book escapes my notice. It's first to the 'Trouble Department' and then to the music page. This is my first letter of any description submitted to any of the various departments. I find that good music is essential for picture accompaniment, but find the proper kind is very limited, unless a player is very apt. I have a splendid player who dishes out splendid and appropriate music for different scenes and characters, although the music is all selected with her own judgment, with just a pointer as to the kind of picture to be shown. I see by reading the music department that you are sending out lists and samples of picture music. Am going to ask will you please send me a few selections."

The writer is in error. I have offered in this page a list of titles of various standard numbers which have been found useful in playing the pictures. A copy will be forwarded to the correspondent who will probably receive it before he reads this. Many thanks for your kind expressions. (As I happen to have the floor, the Moving Picture World will permit me to speak in its behalf.)

"Connecticut." . . . . "Being a subscriber to the Picture World I have become interested in your notes on cue music and effects for the pictures. Noticing a reply from a New York drummer to your statement in Feb. 11th issue 'of playing effects to dramatic pictures'; this gives me the reason for writing this. Few people give the drummer credit for what he does and very few realize the conditions under which he has to work. Of course there are good and bad ones just the same as piano players, but those who are capable should receive some recognition. My idea is exactly as yours; that it is better to leave out an effect than to use the same and spoil the effect of a strong dramatic climax by causing some half-witted or giddy person (who as you know are always in the audience) to burst out with a laugh, which is the cue for the rest of his type to follow. Naturally, I am a drummer, playing in one of the finest picture houses in this section, with an orchestra of four pieces. It has the reputation of being one of the best, as they run all the pictures. I use from the smallest to the largest effect regardless of what it is, my paraphernalia occupying about one-half the pit. The house uses the best films, and there are people who come just to hear the music and effects played." "Managers and musicians kindly take note of this, the same thing has happened in other places. As I said before, a drummer is obliged to use an effect against his judgment and wishes, as in many instances he is, it is he who gets the laugh and not the person who insists upon him doing it. For instance take the Kalem release of 'The Girl Spy Before Vicksburg.' The girl locates the ammunition train through a spy glass some distance away. The next scene is the train passing (as she sees it). Now! Some so-called critic would say, 'Do not reproduce the sound of the horses passing.' Others say, 'Yes, as long as they are on the screen in full view.' Then again, when a ferry boat is crossing, he must blow a dozen boat whistles if cows appear, he must ring a half dozen cow bells, or a baby cry if a lady passes through the picture with a baby, and yet again in some very pathetic scene some one enters and lets the door slam, he must bang doors. In some of the Western pictures he is obliged to perform wonders by imitating galloping horses when not sighted at a long distance. There are many other instances where a drummer is obliged to use a second effect against his wishes, and a drummer (if he is a real drummer) would play the pictures better if he did not have so much advice given him. Kindly give me your opinion of the above troubles." (All I can say is that I know "of my own knowledge" that much of the above is true. Ed.) "There are many who think a drummer is just to make a noise, still he must play bells, xylophone, tympanni and a hundred other things, yet only gets the credit of making a lot of noise. In some theaters they expect all of these and give him the same amount of floor space as the cornetist. Then again you often hear the remark that the piano player should receive more salary than the drummer. Why? No musician in a photo-play house should receive more than the drummer. The piano is furnished and the player simply comes to the theater and plays, and occasionally buys a sheet of music, while a drummer must buy from two to three hundred dollars worth of goods and watch the pictures from start to finish. (And few people realize how fast his mind and hands must work when he is seeing the picture for the first time.) He must buy some trap or effect nearly every week, or perhaps a drum head. He must pay insurance on his outfit, or run the risk of losing it by fire. I think if any one, the drummer should receive more. Please don't think me conceited in any way. I write in the interest of drummers who can 'fill the bill,' as there must be some, even if they are 'few and far between.' I take quite an interest in your articles and hope you will continue them as they are bound to help."

As "Connecticut" seems to have established a case for the drummers' side of the question, I have nothing further to add.

"Indiana" writes a letter containing this query: "Will you please suggest some music suitable for Independent pictures, as our house does not run Licensed films?" As I have had this request before I will say to "Indiana" and others that the manufacturers' label on a picture need make no essential difference in the music. A story is a story and though it may differ in treatment by different producers, the dramatic elements are substantially the same so far as the musical accompaniment is concerned. A good stock of dramatic and descriptive music will apply with equal fitness to the average run of pictures, no matter who makes them. For an idea of the music most apt to be needed see Moving Picture World of Dec. 3, 1910.

"Fewer It Better" Quality vs. Quantity.

"Of making many books
there is no end, and—much study is a weariness of the flesh."—Solomon.

This saying of many centuries ago by the wisest of wise men will, it appears, always be true; the making of books continues with increasing vigor and the study of them increases wearisomeness. Paraphrasing this wisdom perhaps we may justly say:—

In making many pictures
there is no end, and the constant study of them is trying to the nerves.

As with books, so with pictures; they wil increase more and more. There is no doubt about the quantity; neither will there be much doubt about the quality. In books and pictures, while there will always be the poorer kinds, there must also be the better kinds; but wisdom lays emphasis on the "fewer and better" as being not only less wearisome from bewildering numbers, but restful in the reward of value and quality. The output of picture subjects is startling in its profusion; to make a selection is a "wearisome" task to read their description is a labor, even to traverse the labyrinth of titles is a task not to be lightly undertaken. The making of more continues until there is "no end," but it is pleasing to note that quality is asserting itself. Those that do not elevate are eliminated, as if by a living inherent natural law the process of reducing quantity to quality is going on all the time, quietly and unseen. This law also seems to be applying itself to the making of the pictures. Makers are no doubt producing as much volume as before but perhaps numerically "fewer" and qualitatively "better." May the good work go on and the question in all theaters will be not "how many," but "how good;" better advertise six good subjects, known, tried and proved, than nine indifferent ones to disappoint. The better the subject the longer will it live, the poorer the subject the sooner shall it die. There is a study that is not "wearisome to the flesh" and that is the study of those books and pictures which last the longest; the tribunal of the people's good taste is always an interesting study. The name of a good author becomes the power which commands his future writings; the name of the good picture-maker becomes both a synonym for sucesss, and assurance in the future; thus the good is its own best advertisement.

In further pursuance of the wisdom included in the saying at the head of this article it would seem that the wise man would teach also that it is less "wearisome" to make quality than quantity. On mature thought this seems doubtlessly true; surely in everything there is more labor in the bustle of the quantity irrespective of value, than in the quieter dignity of the quality which satisfies. Why multiply words? It is enough to know that the sayings of wisdom are wise and—"A word to the wise is sufficient."

Travel Aid Not a Substitute.

The moving picture not as a substitute for, but as an auxiliary to travel. This impression which the educational film has made upon J. H. Collins, superintendent of city schools, Springfield, Ill., was revealed in a recent talk with a representative of the Moving Picture World. As no movement has been made to introduce the moving pictures in the schools of Springfield it was a pleasing surprise to learn the esteem in which they were held. Mr. Collins' viewpoint was projected in relating an experience while touring Holland. While more or less conversant with the importance of the dikes in The Netherlands, and having a vague conception of how the work was carried on, there were certain features he did not understand. On his travels it was not always practical to ask questions and many operations in the continual battle against the sea which were viewed from his conveyance fostered a curiosity which at that time could not be appeased. His kindly feeling toward the moving picture, therefore, grew when one day at a show he was permitted to witness a reel which not only detailed every process of the levee-building but recalled pleasant memories of his journey abroad. All the little, "Why are the men doing that?" irritations in his mind were relieved as he retraced his jaunt through the busy little country. Mr. Collins has had more or less of an opportunity to see the good side of the moving picture output, that which is utilized by chautauqua and educational workers, but is not necessarily severe upon the product of some of the leading manufacturers. In fact, his occasional visits to the photoplay theaters have revealed little that is derogatory to the picture in general. (Parenthetically it might be well to say, however, that his Springfield houses have been well chosen.) The first entertainment, since the advent of the five-cent theater, is indelibly impressed upon him. It was the film upon which war was declared as it chronicled the career of Mrs. Gunness, of La Porte, Ind., and introduced that Hoosier village to the Associated Press. Credit is given the members of the stock company but the devotee of the photoplay who invited him is still apologizing. Illustration of statistical nature is one of the best and most profitable fields which should help the young people. He has found many portrayals of recognized works which were valuable, citing one to which others might object—Stevenson's "Treasure Island."

Apropos of the picture in the schools Mr. Collins quoted a leading Springfield banker and business man to the effect that their use in education would be universal at no distant time. The stereopticon already is in use in Springfield and little added equipment would be needed. Apparently the bugaboos have been in danger of fire and reported complications of machines.

"WITH STONEWALL JACKSON."

In our last week's issue our readers will remember an illustration from the first Champion Monday release of April 17th. Early this week we had an unexpected opportunity to see this film on the screen and had our expectations of a grand picture fully realized. Very wisely, we think, this picture is not all fighting, but the two scenes where the Southern troops lose their position and again where it is retaken are about as realistic as it is possible to make them. One can almost hear the ping of the bullets and the dull thud of shells as they drop around the heroes on the screen.

The scenes were all well staged and the typical atmosphere of the South with the Negro slaves, or, rather, slaves, and the unflinching and self-sacrificing courage of the Southern women are exceedingly well portrayed. It is one of those pictures that shows both the horrors of war and, at the same time, the grand courage of both men and women that it developed, and will remind audiences of the present day of the terrible struggle through which our country passed and which, with its many lessons, we may be inclined to forget too readily.

Unless we are mistaken, this film should add greatly to the increasing fame of the Independent product, and it will undoubtedly thrill many audiences both North and South.

A New Theatrical Agency.

Taylor's Theatrical Equipment Co., 49-51 West Twenty-Eighth Street, New York City, is fast becoming one of the central points in the moving picture industry. Mr. Taylor, sponsor for the company, being a man of intelligence and experience, having obtained his cinematograph training years ago at the inception of the business, has surrounded himself with a competent staff and built up a very profitable trade in general supplies and theatrical equipment. The well known "Taylor's school for operators" needs no comment, its reputation is well established and is known from coast to coast.

Mr. Taylor wishing to take advantage of all the opportunities offered him, has added a new department to his establishment and wishes to announce the opening of "Taylor's Theatrical Agency," from which it will be possible for managers to secure talent for all lines of amusement, viz.: Vaudeville artists, singers, pianists, lecturers, cashiers, operators, etc., etc.

The booking department will be under the supervision of a Mr. Wm. H. Stanley, a man of many years experience in the theatrical field, as an actor, stage-manager and producer. He enters upon his new duties with a full knowledge of what the new department requires, and enjoys the confidence of Mr. Taylor, as to his ability to shoulder the responsibility with success.

By this arrangement the "Taylor" establishment becomes a unique factor in the theatrical field, as it is the first house of its kind through which a manager can secure everything for a moving picture theater; whether it be help or equipment from the stage wall to the outside lights, and everything between, and can furnish a manager with everything from a single to a circus.

Go to it! Mr. Taylor, our best wishes.

Sociological.

With the advent of the moving picture there also appeared many evils, vice in various forms seemed suddenly to flourish and attach themselves, parasite like, upon the moving picture; for these conditions the moving picture was blamed, censured, denounced; in the heat of the moment few stopped to think, or tried to analyze the situation, or look into the conditions.

Reformers are of two kinds: The self appointed ones—always rash and violent, hasty of speech, slow of judgment, wrong in conclusions; the other kind is of an engineering turn of mind, who look for the cause while only condemning the effect.

Time is a great revealer, as well as a great reformer; now that the hubbub of the "moving picture evil" has passed into history, it is interesting to note the true situation—as it then appeared.

The moving picture, unlike anything which ever preceded it in the amusement world, immediately became popular, universal and almost omnipresent. Appearing everywhere at once, it naturally appeared among "all sorts and conditions of men." Those of clean purpose saw in it an instrument of value to them in entertaining the crowds aroused by its popularity. Those of questionable and unclean purpose, seeing by this same popularity an instrument whereby their own nefarious tastes and enterprises could be exploited, used the attractiveness of the picture as an allurement to their schemes.

"Wheresoever the carcass is, there are the vultures gathered together." Financial and moral vultures are always ready to feed upon the public as a prey. It matters not to them whether they despoil others of money or virtue, as long as their particular appetites are satisfied. Thus the moving picture revealed the presence in our midst of a class of vultures, and a class of willing victims, comparable only to the wilds of the forests and the habits of animals.

Should the moving pictures be destroyed for this? By no means! Should they even be blamed? By no means! except by the harsh reformer seeking notoriety. On the other hand, all thanks is due to the picture for revealing these social conditions which otherwise might not have been discovered.

It would be as reasonable to kill the scientist who discovered a dangerous germ, and blame him for the disease and its powers of growth, as to blame the cinematograph for bringing to light a condition of things, which only needed to be exposed to be destroyed. All praise to the moving picture for both exposing the disease and providing a remedy.

At this juncture a new class of people discovered the possibilities of the cinematograph; these were the educators, who immediately began to use its powers in combatting the evils it had discovered. The social evils of the slums of the great cities were the first upon which rays of cinematographic light were turned; settlement houses and institutional workers soon found the value of the moving picture in both showing life and conditions, as it should and should not be.

The public has been enlightened as to the true conditions, how the underworld lives is now a well known story; educational and financial aid has followed the light of the new teacher, and a new future is opened up before a class of people hitherto neglected. Added to this must be the additional happy value of the cinematograph, as bringing to those less fortunate in the possession of this world's wealth, a simple form of ready instruction; besides a hall of amusement, in which reproductions are given of that which the most wealthy and highly favored, formerly alone enjoyed.

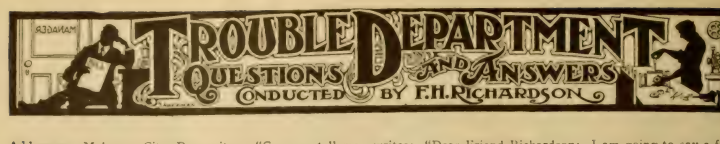
THE FILM EXCHANGE
61 West 14th St. New York City



Addresses.—Mahanoy City, Pa., writes: "Can you tell me who makes the Gundlach lens?"

The Gundlach lenses are made by the Gundlach-Manhattan Optical Company, Rochester, N. Y., and a letter thus addressed will reach that company.

Handbook.—Canton, Pa., writes: "In reading the Trouble Department, I find frequent reference to a certain handbook. Will you please tell me more about this book and its cost? I find no advertisement nor further reference to it."

The Handbook is designed as a book of instructions for operators and managers, and is the first work of its kind ever published. The editor of this department is its author. The book contains 176 pages of matter, besides the index, etc. There are numerous illustrations. It teaches, among other things, how to set the carbons properly; how to find the focal length of lens to project a given picture at a given distance. How to make wire joints; the difference between series and multiple in resistance; what resistance is and how it acts. The different kinds of rheostats in common use. Transformers: what they are and how they act. Tables of wire carrying capacities, etc. Definitions of electrical terms and how to use them. Descriptions and instructions regarding various switches, fuses, condenser breakage; the stereopticon. Directions for making repairs on various machines. How to read an electric meter; illuminating the auditorium; ventilation; bell wiring; theater decoration; seating; setting the shutter of various machines, etc., etc., covering as well as could be reasonably expected in a first work, everything connected with the moving picture business. Price of the book is $1.50, postpaid.

Lamp House and Other Things.—Mr. J. C. Kilburn, Eureka, Cal., writes: "Have read your valuable articles for some time and as I have found much good in them, will try to pass a few ideas along. I have built a lamp house 20 inches long, 18 inches high and 7 inches wide, with a cone that allows the full diameter of the condenser lenses to be used so that I get an increased amount of light. I have not broken a condenser yet and it has been in operation a month. Before I used to break them almost at once. I also rebuilt my lamp (Edison) so it will open 13 inches. I use 65 amperes A. C. and can now run several reels without re-setting carbons. If you can use it I will send a diagram next time. I use a three-blade inside shutter with excellent results, but intend installing an outside shutter, as I do not believe it will cut so much light. What do you think about it? Don't you think a 7½ and a 6½ condenser better for a 9 x 12 picture at 50 feet than two 7½ inch? I noticed an article from somebody in Kansas who changed a two-pin 1903 Edison to a one-pin. He didn't say how he got his top and bottom sprockets running the right speed, so I presume he cut a new cam shaft drive gear. Quite a job, I think, on an Edison, 1903. How about it? I also wish to say I tried the rabbit foot transformer man's wonderful discovery about burning the carbons perpendicular. My condenser failed to 'draw' the light rays, but maybe that was because I use a Preddy, instead of a rabbit's foot, transformer. If it is advertising the hot air man is after, he sure needs it."

I shall be very glad, indeed, to have a more extended description and sketch of your lamp, Friend Kilburn, showing just how you remodeled it. As to the relative amount of light cut by the outside and inside shutter, I would refer you to page 298, February 11th issue, where that matter is fully dealt with. The smaller the diameter of the shutter the greater the proportional part of the circle necessarily covered by its main blade. Therefore the larger the diameter of the shutter, the less light its main blade will cut, though after going beyond say 7 or 8 inches the benefit derived from increased diameter becomes very slight. As to the changing of the Edison two-pin to one-pin movement, the speed of the upper and lower sprockets would not necessarily have to be changed, but the speed of the cam would have to be exactly doubled, which would, of course, necessitate a change in the gears. Of course, if the cam speed, as related to crank speed, is to remain the same, then the feed sprockets speed would have to be changed and the crank speed doubled.

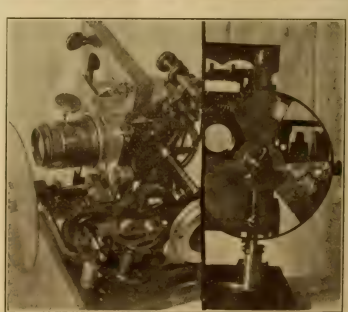
Circuit Breaker Again.—Mr. H. S. Klink, Canton, O., writes: "Dear Friend Richardson: I am going to say a few words about the circuit breaker mentioned in March 4th issue. It is not a very good thing to use with a projection arc lamp. I used one for about three months, something like three years ago, and it works just like it would on a large motor without a starting box. Everytime you light your lamp, out goes the breaker. I set mine for 100 amperes and even at that it would not hold the arc at the start, so I gave it up as a bad job. I have only blown two 40-ampere fuses since I removed the breaker. By setting the shutter of an Edison one-pin machine about ¼-inch away from the aperature, would it effect the pictures? I want to make that boxing ¼-inch larger to give better and longer wear on the shaft. I think the boxing is too short. I missed the issue of March 11, 1911. Will you please have it sent to me?"

Commenting on the circuit breaker end of your letter is unnecessary, as it speaks for itself. I do not think the setting of your shutter up close to the aperture would have a bad effect on the picture. I do not see why it should. In fact, presumably the closer the shutter is to the aperture, the better the result, speaking, of course, of inside shutters.

Likes the Department.—Mr. J. D. Welsch sends in $1.50 for the Handbook and writes: "I think the department is instructive as well as very interesting and I am very thankful for the help I have received from its columns."

The book has gone forward and we are very glad to know you like the department. There are others.

Good Work.—Mr. Chas. H. Addams, Rockford, Ill., whose portrait, taken from his letterhead, is here shown, writes: "Enclosed find some photos of my Powers No. 5; also of the circuit breaker, my own work. I need not describe how the outside shutter is connected, because the picture tells the story, except that the shutter doesn't move with the framing carriage. There is no more flicker than on the new model Edison; also the shutter is never out of time with the intermittent movement. Some two weeks ago an article appeared in the department concerning circuit breakers in theaters.



"I have used the breaker here illustrated for five or six months and it has, so far, never failed to work. First, I bought a 100-ampere three-pole switch. I had an old fan motor from which I took the coils. I then unwound the fine wire and wound the 1¼-inch core with No. 6 magnetic wire. I put a coil on each outside knife with the bar of iron on the bottom. I can set the breaker to operate a range from 25 to 100 amperes, but it is set at 70 now and has been ever since I made it. What do you think of the tension springs. Understand, the outside shutter shown cannot be used very well where you have to use the stereo lens. I use a dissolver of my own make."

Well, Friend Addams, judging by what you have shown us in the pictures, I should say that you are something of a genius. The circuit breaker stunt is simple enough, and yet it is something I do not believe I ever would have thought of—the utilizing of an ordinary knife switch, I mean. The outside shutter shows a great deal of ingenuity on your part. What I cannot quite understand, however, is, does the side bar carrying the center gear, swing with the carriage at its front end, or doesn't it? If it does, I should say there would be a good deal of loss motion when the film first starts when the carriage was at either extreme of its travel. If it doesn't, then I should say the lost motion would be even worse. However, if the lost motion is not sufficient to interfere with the action of the shutter it, of course, doesn't amount to much. From what you say, I suppose that is the case. As to the tension shoes, that is a proposition I heartily agree with you on. I was after the Nicholas Power, the Motograph and Edison companies for more than two years to get them to adopt a similar shoe. The Powers people finally concluded to do so on the No. 6 machine. I do not like and do not believe in a thin limber tension spring. It has too many objectionable features, not the least of which is its propensity to wear the aperture plate tracks unevenly, thus inducing buckling of the film as it passes the aperture. The viascope had the best tension arrangement of them all, to my way of thinking.

Carbon Setting.—Mr. George L. Hawkens, New Orleans, La., writes: "I have noticed the argument about carbon setting and agree that good light is an utter impossibility with carbons central and straight up and down. I have tried this out thoroughly, long ago, and that was the inevitable conclusion, but there is one thing which must be taken into consideration in this connection. Your idea and my idea of good light and the idea of those who claim good results from straight up and down setting may be widely different. I know an operator who is very proud of his light, yet I would not consider it even passably good. Then, too, it is a fact that many who have not the necessary knowledge and patience to get the best results from the slant set such as you advocate for A. C., are able to get better results with the 'rabbit foot man's' way. But it by no means follows that the light they get is good—it merely is better than they were able to get the other way. Using A. C. the way I (and yourself) set the carbons, requires close and accurate work as well as real knowledge, but given these factors the result is far better than can be had with the straight up and down set."

I had been on the point of saying this same thing several times, Friend Hawkens, but was waiting to see if anyone would catch the point. You are absolutely correct in saying that it requires real skill and knowledge to get the best result from slant setting of carbons on A. C. You are also right in saying that unless one possesses the requisite skill and knowledge one might very likely get as good, or even better results with the perpendicular set, since that setting requires practically no skill or knowledge at all. It is merely a matter of centering two carbon points, which anyone could easily do. I shall be very glad to have a letter describing conditions in picturedom in Havana. Shall also be glad to meet you on your return. You may have noticed that within the past two weeks my views on carbon setting have been upheld by Mr. Gage, of Cornell University, also by the Edison Company.

Five Dollars a Week.—From a certain city comes the following: "I would like very much to write something for the (M. P. W.) might cause considerable trouble. Two operators out of three in this city draw $5 per week, and that department, of which I have been a reader for a considerable time, and in which I take great interest. However, to express my thoughts at this time in the 'good book' is about enough said. Find enclosed order for Handbook, which I would like you to send at once, as I shall be leaving this place within two weeks."

I have respected your wishes concerning the suppressing of name and town, Neighbor, but what you say about that five-dollar a week wage is true I certainly would like to hand out a roast that would burn holes in this paper. It is a shame for those operators to demand all that money for one week's work. If I were a manager in your city, paying such a princely salary as that, I should demand that the operator receiving same wear whiskers so that I could use his face for a scrubbing brush, thus saving the cost of mops, or, in an emergency, out of operating hours his whiskers could be used as a pen wiper or office door mat. A man drawing all that salary should not only do the operating, but also tend the manager's garden, black his shoes, milk the cows, scrub the kitchen floor, do the janitor work in the theater and any other stunt he could think of to help make himself really worth the money paid. The Handbook will be forwarded you immediately.

Bad Sprocket Holes.—California (name of town suppressed) contributes the following: "I have been a steady reader of the 'World' ever since I began operating, and wish to extend to you at least a bushel of thanks. I attribute much of my success to the information received through the department. It has always been my policy to go over my film and machine carefully each day, keeping my operating room and everything therein clean, arranging a place for everything and have everything in its place. Nevertheless, I attribute such success as has crowned my efforts to the teachings received through the 'World,' and I cannot express myself too strongly in praise of the department and its editor. I am enclosing $1.50 for the Handbook. Now, for a few questions: (1) Kindly give me a rule to test for grounds and shorts. Also how to figure out resistance at transformer; how to figure what amperage I am getting at different contacts on the transformer, which is a Preddy. Also voltage at the arc; current is 110 A. C.; (2) Kindly explain method of lining up intermittent on 1909 model motiograph; (3) My lamp sways in lamp house, although it is as tight as I can get it. That is, it sways on the post, though the post itself is firm. The carbon holder on top gets out of line quite often, although seemingly tight. How can I remedy this trouble? I am trying very hard to become expert in my chosen profession and any assistance you can give me through the department will be greatly appreciated. I enclose a few samples of film which I cut off before starting the show the other night. Can you explain why it seems to slide through the machine; that is, there are continual mis-frames?"

I am very much pleased to know that the Department has been of assistance to you and trust we shall continue to merit your kind thoughts. And, now, as to your questions: (1) You will find this partially answered in my reply to Denver in another part of the Department this week. To test for short circuit, put the lamps of the circuit to be tested from their receptacles; also remove one of the fuses. Now attach one of the test lamp wires to one contact of the fuse removed and the other wire to the opposite contact, thus substituting the lamp for the fuse. If the test lamp burns, there is a short somewhere on that circuit. Use a low C. P. lamp in this test. Before using this test, however, the line should be tested for ground, since if grounded the lamp might burn through the ground, the current passing to a grounded wire of opposite polarity on some other circuit. As to how to figure out resistance at transformer, I do not quite understand what you mean by that question. I cannot tell you how to figure what amperage you get from different contacts of the Preddy economizer, since I am not acquainted with that instrument. I should be glad to receive cuts and description of the Preddy transformer. Would suggest you write its manufacturers, who will no doubt supply you the desired information;

(2) The Motiograph intermittent movement is enclosed in an oil tight casing and there is no method, so far as I know, by which you can "line it up." I think very likely what you really mean is how can you eliminate lost motion in the intermittent; or, in other words, bring the star and cam closer together. The method of doing this you will find very completely described on pages 121 and 122 of the Handbook; also how to install new star and cam;

(3) I presume you have a motiograph lamp. I have used these lamps, but I do not now remember just how they attach to the post. I would suggest you remove the lamp from the post, examine same carefully and find out for yourself just what the trouble is. I believe you are entirely competent to hunt this thing up for yourself, if you only think so. As to the film you send, it is easy to see what the trouble is, but not so easy to guess what did the damage. The sprocket holes are, in places, almost twice the width (lengthwise of the film) they should be. This naturally lets the film slip into mis-frame. The film apparently is not old, as some of the sprocket holes are not worn a particle. Just what caused the damage I cannot say. But it explains the mis-frame proposition all right; the fault lies in the damaged sprocket holes of the film. The reason I say I do not know what did the damage is that in places where the sprocket holes are perfectly good on one side, they are badly cut out, immediately opposite.

Dissolving Shutter.—Ohio (name of town suppressed) writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for Handbook. Can you tell me what it will cost for a set of dissolving shutters similar to the shutter on a kodak? I have been operating for about four years and have tried to give the managers a square deal by supplying high class projection. I have noticed where several operators project their carbon tips by means of a pin hole in the lamp house wall. For myself, I prefer a small mirror right beside the ruby glass in the lamp house door."

These shutters are known as "iris diophragm" and are made by the Bausch & Lomb Optical Company, Rochester, N. Y. They are used on the Powers Dissolving lanern, the Monarch Dissolver, made by C. B. Kleine, 19 East 21st Street, New York, and others. You can procure a set from any of the machine manufacturers or from Bausch & Lomb, Rochester, N. Y.

Focusing.—W. B. Hamblen, Colfax, Wash., writes: "I note that Iowa snaps his fire shutter up and down to focus the title. Why wouldn't it be advisable to take a piece of tin cut the same width as your film, scalloping the lower end, as indicated in the accompanying sketch?

This can be used any time when needed. Bend the top so that it will hang on. I am always glad to see the 'World' come, for I know there will be some good ideas within its pages."

Right you are, Neighbor Hamblen. The focusing may easily be done with a strip of tin, as you have suggested; or, better still, with a piece of mica cut the width of the film, upon which have been made scratch lines about 1/16 inch apart, crossing each other like a checker board. Either one will do the trick all right.

Can It Be True?—Some three weeks ago, the editor of this Department received an unsigned letter from Pittsburg, the same being a red-hot roast on about everything connected with the operating game in that city. I published notice of receipt of the letter at the time (page 534, March 11 issue) and asked for further information from Pittsburg, but none has come to hand. The following, however, has been received: "Editor Trouble Department: I do not see many letters from Pittsburg in the Department. It will try to give you a line on projection in this city. There appeared an article some time ago pertaining to the Pittsburg license, and you seemed to doubt the writer's word. The license here is a joke. Any one can get one whether he can pass the examination or not. The law requires each applicant to be 21 years of age, but at the same time they give license to persons only nineteen. This is not based upon hearsay, as the writer sent a nineteen-year-old boy up, who marked his age as 19, yet he received a license. They even give them to managers, some of whom do not know a thing about operating. The manager takes out a license, hires a $6 or $7 a week boy and—there you are. One can get no satisfaction out of the superintendent of the Board of Examiners and it seems to be impossible to get a conference with Mayor McGee. Wages are low; $15 the average for a 11-hour grind and $10 for a night show. Talk about your graft! You ought to come to Pittsburg."

I have published this letter for the reason that if the facts alleged are true, then the officials responsible for such a disgraceful state of affairs ought to be kicked out of office. Understand, I do not know that any of this is true, neither have I any reason to suppose it is not true, since no Pittsburg man has taken the trouble to deny it, though asked to do so. If such a condition of affairs really does exist, then it is a disgrace to the moving picture business of the city of Pittsburg and all connected with it, and the editor of this Department would be only too glad to expose such work. If, on the other hand, it is not true, I shall be really pleased to publish that fact. It is facts we are after; and, for the credit of the business, let us hope they will not prove to be as bad as is indicated by the foregoing letter.

Lamp Coloring.—Houston, Tex., asks: "Friend Richardson: Where can I get the dye, or whatever it is, for coloring incandescent globes? Is it waterproof, and how is it applied?"

I presume there are several places where good lamp coloring compounds may be had, but I personally know of only one, viz.: the Chicago Stage Lighting Company, 24 Lasalle Street, near Washington Street, Chicago, Ill. The colors for sale come in concentrated liquid form and are thinned down according to directions. I personally know the preparations sold by this company to be excellent for the purpose indicated. They are waterproof to a considerable degree, though I am not sure whether or not they guarantee them to be so. The dye is applied by making the solution and merely dipping the globes into same. It is a collodion preparation and dries almost immediately. Any one can do the coloring.

Screen and Decorations.—St. Clair, Pa., writes: "I am building a theater 20 x 150 feet and should like to have full information as regards ceiling and side walls. Would metal be better than plaster, and what color of paints would look the best? What screen would be best to get?"

It would require a great deal of space, St. Clair, to go fully into this matter. Plaster walls, with ornamental plaster centerpieces, etc., finished with high grade wall paper, can be made to produce a surprisingly beautiful effect. In fact, where this is rightly done, the writer likes it better than anything he has ever seen for interior decoration of a theater room such as I presume you have, judging from the dimensions. Understand clearly what I mean. This kind of work, if done cheaply is abominable. To get the right effect from paper, the selection of materials must be very carefully made and they must be put up by an artist in that line. Pressed steel makes a very good wall and ceiling, provided some degree of judgment be used in selecting the patterns. Nine times out of ten, where pressed steel is used, the selection of patterns displays execrable taste, running too much to "gingerbread" effects. Nine times out of ten the steel is not well put on and when either of these things happen, the effect is not at all good. If you make the selection of pressed steel for your walls, let me impress upon you the necessity of keeping away from too much "gingerbread" work. Use rather smooth panel effects in preference and paint with harmonizing colors of a mat finish paint, that is to say, a paint mixed from white lead, and suitable coloring pigments and about one-third to one-half oil and the rest turpentine. Some of the harmonizing colors are as follows: "Dark red, medium green and light red; dark green, salmon and blue; yellowish green, purple and canary yellow. These colors should not be used in their raw state, but should be toned down. For instance, taking the first combination, dark red, green and light red: the dark red is all right; the green should be toned by the addition of yellow and the light red should be made rather on the pink order. I do not mean to imply by this that these are the colors you should necessarily select for your decoration. I only cite them to make the meaning of harmony clear, or show what I mean by "harmonizing colors." As a matter of fact, a very pretty combination for moving picture theater work is a soft brown wall trimmed with light tan. The tan, however, should be quite light to give some contrast. The effect is soft and pleasing if it doesn't reflect much light; neither is it dark enough to be gloomy.

Carbon Flaming.—Schenectady, N. Y., writes: "I have just been experimenting with a moving picture rectifier and arc lamp on which the operator claimed he had trouble with long flame shooting out at various times. I saw this flame, which sometimes went out four or five inches and which the operator claimed was destructive to the condensers. Can you tell me what caused this? The current at the arc at the time was about 35 amperes direct current from the rectifier; voltage from the arc about 60. Is it the carbons which caused the trouble, or do you think there is some kind of magnetic draft? I do not believe it is the carbons, and yet it is the only thing I can lay it to, although I first changed the connections of the rectifier so that the current was 35 amperes, 45 volt, and the flaming was reduced to normal. I should appreciate your comments on this point."

I do not know, Schenectady, that any really intelligent reply can be given you. It is a well known fact that, where heavy amperage is used, when the arc is burned long there is much flaming of the carbons. This flame shoots out at an angle, sometimes striking the top of the condenser lens. It, of course, adds largely to the already high temperature inside the lamp house and thus increases the liability of condenser breakage. This latter effect is, of course, exaggerated if the flame actually strikes the top edge of the condenser lens, as is frequently the case where short focal length condensers are used. I note that at the time the flaming took place the voltage across the arc was 60 and the amperage 35. This would indicate, of course, a very long arc, and moreover it would indicate a very heavy amperage when the arc was shortened to bring the drop down to 45. I should say that with the arc burning at 45 drop you would have had not less than 45 and possibly 50 amperes. That a magnetic draft has anything to do with it, I do not believe. Such experiments as I have made seem to disprove the presence of any such influence in any marked degree. According to accepted theory, the current leaps from the positive to the negative carbon across the air gap. Late experiments apparently have proven the fact that where a wire carrying heavy amperage makes a right angle turn, there is something flies off the wire, apparently by centrifugal force. If this is true, it then would seem to indicate the fact that electric current has weight, at least to some degree; or, putting it another way, it would seem to indicate that current is material substance. If this is the fact and there is material substance, having weight, leaping from one carbon to the other, just exactly what effect that would have in creating air current in and around the arc, which might influence the direction of the flame arising therefrom, would be problematical. Understand, I do not know; and by that same token I believe that no man living knows exactly what does take place in and around an electric arc. I make this assertion unqualifiedly, based upon the fact that we do not know what electricity is; therefore, we are not in a position to gauge accurately all its possible effects. I suppose I shall probably be jumped on for these remarks. Be that, however, as it may. I have stated what I believe to be as near facts as anybody is able to give in this connection. I might add, however, that this flaming is present under the indicated conditions, regardless of what kind of soft cored projection carbons are used. Whether it would be present with very hard carbon, I cannot say. I think, however (merely a guess) that the flame itself comes from the binder of the carbon. I have referred this matter to a large carbon manufacturer and on receipt of his comments will publish same.

New York Union.—I understand that Local Union No. 35, of which Wm. Lang is president, and John S. Clark, secretary, is taking on new life of late and beginning to show signs of being of some real use—a thing it has not been in the past. I am glad to see this and assure the men that anything the editor of this department can do to assist in the establishment of a REAL UNION will be done most cheerfully but gladly. Certainly, if there is a city in the U. S. that needs a real, live union of operators it is New York. Efforts have been made at various times to organize operators' associations, etc., but they have met with little success. There is now, I am told, an independent union, with no affiliation, numbering a hundred and a half members. All these organizations, including the officially affiliated organization, have been abortive in the past. They have accomplished little or no good. Divided forces cannot hope to accomplish much. Get together in one solid substantial body. Elect cool, level-headed men of mature years as your officers and set about to gradually needed matter of straightening matters out, from the operator's standpoint, in this city. Twelve and fifteen dollars a week and reels of films run in seven minutes are things which cry to Heaven for rectification. Later, since writing the above, the editor has attended a meeting of the union, which is described elsewhere.

Testing for Grounds.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "Friend Richardson: Things are very much up in the air here just now and the old Operators' Union seems to be on its last legs. It may rally, but I do not think so. At any rate, not under the management of its old officers. Will tell you all about it later when things have settled down. Will you kindly tell me the various, as well as the best, ways of testing for grounds? Also would it be possible for a ground on another man's circuit to blow my fuses?"

Sorry to hear of the trouble in Chicago. I was in hopes that the organization would establish itself successfully to the lasting benefit of Chicago operators. As to the matter of grounds, etc. To begin at the end and work backwards, if you have a ground on the negative wire of your circuit and in some house half a mile a mile, more or less, away there is a positive ground and by reason of contact with water or gas pipes and mains the connection is a good one—practically a metallic circuit—then one fuse or the other might blow; his positive or your negative, dependent on which was working nearest its capacity on its own load. If your positive and somebody else's negative were grounded the same way, the result would be the same, except it would be your positive fuse which would blow, or else possibly his negative. As a matter of fact, when fuses blow by reason of a ground that is usually exactly what does take place, since seldom will both wires of a circuit become grounded at one and the same time. The methods of testing for grounds are quite numerous. The best test is made with a volt meter, or wheatstone bridge. But these appliances, of course, are not usually available to the operator and in most cases he would not know how to use the bridge if it were. The practical method, therefore, is either a test lamp or bell. A fairly good test may be made as follows: remove all lamps of the circuit from their sockets so that there is absolutely no connection between the negative and positive wires at any point. Remove the fuses and in their place substitute, either by screwing directly into the socket if a plug fuse is used, or by wires if it is a cartridge fuse, a test lamp which should be of low c. p.—the lower the better—a 1 or 2 c. p. lamp being ideal for this purpose, though a 4 c. p. will do. If the other side of the system is not grounded it will then be necessary to establish a temporary ground by attaching a wire to the live side of the other fuse and connecting it to a gas or water pipe or to something that is grounded. If the fuse lamp lights up there is a ground on that wire. The other wire may then be tested in the same manner. (See cut).

CUT OF LAMP HERE ....

You may also use an ordinary electric bell connected in series with two or three batteries. To do this, remove the fuses, but leave the lamps turned on. Touch one end of the wire to a water or gas pipe, or something else that is grounded, and the other end to the wire of the circuit wire at any point. If there is a ground the bell will ring. You may then turn out the lamps or remove them from their sockets and test each wire separately and see on which one is the ground. The bell may also be used to test for break in wire. To do this attach one end of the wire to the circuit end (dead end) of the fuse contact, first having removed the fuse and taken out all lamps. Then carry the other end along the wire, touching it at various points. The bell will ring every time the wire is touched until you pass the break, and you may thus locate the break in the wire very closely.

Daylight Projector.—Mr. Carl V. Smith, Denver, Col., writes: "I notice some mention of a machine projecting daylight pictures, or rather projecting pictures in daylight. I understand a test of this mahine was made in New York City recently and it proved entirely satisfactory. What is your opinion of the proposition? I should like to install one in an airdome this summer if it is practical."

Your letter, Friend Smith, is merely a replica of more than 50 received in the past two or three weeks. I am sorry to say that I am unable to answer your question. That such a machine was tested here in New York City, I understand to be the fact, and I have been told that the test was satisfactory. This, however, is a matter in which it would be necessary to "show" me. According to my views, there are just two possible ways of projecting daylight pictures, one being by means of a peculiar screen and the other by means of light sufficiently brilliant to overcome the effects of daylight. The first, or screen end, of this proposition has, in a measure, been successfully accomplished. Pictures have been projeted right on the bright sunlight and good pictures, too. The drawback was, however, that it was necessary to sit square in front of the "curtain" in order to see the picture, the said screen consisting of a pigeon-hole arrangement, the sides of the pigeon-holes being painted black and the bottom white. As to the second proposition, namely, the projection of a light that will overcome daylight—well, on that particular subject the editor of this Department is from Missouri and he will certainly have to be shown. One thing that looks just a little bit fishy is the fact that I cannot find a single practical operator who was invited to witness the test made in New York City. It is useless to encumber my personal mail with letters of inquiry concerning this poropistion. Just as soon as I find out that the parties exploiting this new "machine" have something that is practical and of value, I shall say so through the columns of the department. Until that time, writing to me on the subject will be a waste of energy, as I shall not be in position to give you intelligent information.

Slide Coloring.—Indiana (name of town suppressed) writes: "Can you tell me where I can procure the different colored inks used in making slides? And also where I can procure the glass and brushes used in making same? I do not remember seeing this question asked and answered in the department."

You can procure the required inks, brushes, etc., of any dealer in photographic supplies. Your local photographer can give you the names of the nearest wholesale houses. Slide cover glass, mats and strip binder may be had from your film exchange or from any dealer in photographic supplies, or the editor of this department can supply you with them; price of glasses 25 cents per dozen. Plates for solid negatives can be had from photographic supply dealers, of course.

Film Cleaner.—Arizona (name of town suppressed) writes: "What size condenser should I use for 78-foot throw, Edison machine, A. C. current? Also, what kind of a film cleaner do you endorse. I intend to get one and clean films before running them. How is the Mortimer film cleaner advertised in your paper?"

I cannot answer your first question, Arizona, without knowing the width of the picture. Will say, however, that unless you are throwing a very large picture you ought to have two 7½-inch condensing lenses. The focal length of your condensing lens has a direct relation to the focal length of the objective lens, and I cannot tell what focal length objective you have without knowing the width of your picture. The Mortimer film cleaner is as good as any I know of. Films can only be thoroughly cleaned, however, after they have been waterproofed. You say your letter is not written for publication. Again I must remind correspondents that personal letters are only replied to where from $1 to $10 is enclosed, dependent upon the nature of the questions asked.

Low Salaries.—Whitehall, N. Y., writes: "I was an electrical contractor before entering the field of projecti on. I am trying to get operating in this part of the state on a sound basis. Operators are very poorly paid in this section. I am trying to communicate with the local branch of moving picture operators at Boston and see what I can do towards starting a union up here. The managers seem to think that a schoolboy can do the work all right. My way of thinking is that a good, practical man cannot be had for less than $25 per week. The managers here, on the other hand, apparently believe $12 to $14 to be something elegant in the way of salary for an operator. Kindly advise me how I can get a New York State license, as I should like to procure one. I am aware of the fact that the Legislature is now acting upon the matter of licensing all operators and I think probably operators will get some practical protection against the schoolboy then."

I must admit, Whitehall, you have got the best of me on the license proposition. If the Legislature has anything new in contemplation I haven't heard of it. So far as I know, there is no such thing as a state license in New York, the nearest thing to it being the New York City license; to procure which one must appear in person and take the examination, sometimes waiting a week or two after making application before being examined. It is necessary to make the original application in person. No doubt the Boston boys will inform you fully as to the necessary steps to be taken in forming a local union in your vicinity. I certainly wish you success in the undertaking. You are, however, to some extent mistaken in supposing that the license is any large protection to operators. It does, of course, help some, but the "some" should be printed in rather small letters. If boards of commissioners really would refuse to pass any but competent operators, then it would be different and the first effect of that kind of an action would be an increase of about 500 per cent. in salaries, because there would be but mighty few operators left after the board got through. In practice, however, about all the examination does is to shut out those who are rankly incompetent, and sometimes, in some places, it doesn't even do that.

Cooling the Theater.—Vernon, Tex., comes across with the following: "We are in a quandary as to how to cool our theater this spring and summer, which we will either have to do or build an air dome. Will you please write us, or publish in the next World, how best to cool a house 30x110, 14 ft. ceiling? It is 90 ft. from the machine, or lobby, to the stage and 20 ft. back of the curtain to the rear end of the building. We have curtains, etc., for vaudeville, but do not use them. We already have five 18-inch wall fans, two on each long wall and one on the back, which makes a pretty good breeze, it seems, but as we have nothing to carry the air out of the house, except when the wind is stirring, these fans seem to make very poor headway in cooling the building. We should like also to know your best plan for building an air dome. We enjoy the World and the Trouble Department very much."

Well do I remember your town, Vernon, for over the desk of the leading hotel in 1890 (or was it in '89) was the following verse: "Six miles to wood, 600 feet to water and 6 feet to hell; God bless our home!" I will never forget the first time I laid eyes on that sign. The country has changed vastly since then, and while the verse might have been more or less appropriate at that time, it isn't by any manner of means applicable now. As to cooling the theater, I have had a ventilation firm write you direct. You do not say whether the building is one or more stories. If it is one-story I would suggest the installation of some roof ventilators, supplemented by a good-sized exhaust fan, say one 36 inches in diameter, with heavy angles to its blades, so that it will move a maximum amount of air when running at a comparatively low speed. This fan may be installed in a small coop on the roof, if the building is one-story, being connected, of course, to a suitable exhaust pipe entering the ceiling, or it may be set in front or back wall; the back wall preferably if you do not want to use vaudeville. I would also suggest that in the heat of summer three or four ceiling fans would be a very decided help. By ceiling fans, I mean those with wooden blades about three feet in diameter. I won't go into this more at this time, as I have had the ventilation firm write you. As to the air dome, in order to give intelligent instruction, it would be necessary that I be made fully acquainted with the individual case. That is to say, the size and shape of the lot, etc., etc. Giving general information would be altogether too vague. I may say, however, that owing to the fact that on moonlight nights there is always lots of light, the entire front or curtain end should be painted black, with a wide black cloth hood over the top of the screen. Again, however, this might not apply in some cases. In fact, it is foolishness to try to give any general instructions. Such instructions can only be given to fit the individual case. On receipt of plans showing the size and shape of lot, its surroundings, whether buildings or not, and any available data, including the direction the curtain will face, accompanied by a fee of $10, I shall be glad to go into the matter fully and give you or anyone else the full benefit of such knowledge as I may possess. Treating individual cases of this kind in the department would be practically impossible as each case would consume half or more of the space allowed me.

A correction.—Mr. M. P. Williamson, Attica, Ind., writes: "I wish to contradict, not in the spirit of contradiction, but in the hope that it may save trouble for some operator, the statement made on page 128 of Handbook. You say that the Powers No. 6 intermittent movement is absolutely non-adjustable. This might possibly be true of the original Powers No. 6, but the intermittent shaft bearings on the late model are slightly eccentric, allowing adjustment of the cross Have been looking for three weeks for sketch showing simple method of squaring condensers, aperture plate and objective combination. Have I overlooked this, or has same not yet appeared? Tell your stenographer that I talk, eat, sleep, breathe, drink and dream moving pictures and that "M.P." might possibly be construed to mean what she suggests."

The statement as regards the Powers No. 6 intermittent movement was correct when it was written, and was approved by the Powers Company. Since the Handbook was on the press, however, a change in the model was made and an eccentric bushing was added, so that it is possible to tighten the cross against the cam of the Powers No. 6. Let me say right here, however, that operators making this adjustment should be very careful not to get it too tight; the adjustment is entirely practical but must be very carefully made. The sketch showing how to square the lens combinations appeared on page 421 February 25th issue. The method there shown is probably as simple as any correct and accurate method which can be devised. The stenographer part of Neighbor Williams' letter refers to something I said in relation to his letter appearing on page 598, March 18th issue.

MOVING PICTURES ON 14th STREET, N. Y.

When Mr. Fox took on the vast Academy of Music he paid a rental of $100,000 a year for a building which cost its owners but three times as much. Although plays produced by a stock company thrived there, Mr. Fox no doubt foresees the day when even this great structure, New York's erstwhile home of grand opera, will also become a gold mine through the lure of the camera man. Then will be presented the spectacle of four theaters having a combined seating capacity of 10,000 persons, within a few yards of each other, and entertaining at a fair computation 80,000 persons daily (the Union Square Theater being the fourth house implied).

Such is the vogue of the moving picture in this, the 1911th year of the Christian Era.

"The Wedding Bell" (Edison).—An educational film in that it shows the horrible conditions which exist in many tenements in the large cities. It clearly represents where many serious cases of typhoid originate and while there is no attempt at drama in the narrative it is dramatic in the strength of its simple story. The menace is brought home to the owner of the tenement in such a graphic way that it cannot be misunderstood. Such an appeal is impossible in a majority of instances, but in this instance it helps the picture, giving a life touch which contributes to its interest. The picture will do quite as good work as the Red Cross and other similar films which have gone before.

"A War Time Escape" (Kalem).—A war story intermixed with a love tale, having its beginning before the war and brought to a happy consummation afterward. These war tales have considerable interest and in instances like this where an effort is made to make the story true to possibilities the interest is maintained throughout with no violent shock. The accessories and setting appear to be reasonably accurate. The only point where one's credulity requires reenforcement is when the girl, her Confederate brother and her Union lover are all together under one roof. It is not impossible. It is somewhat improbable.

"The Inventor's Rights" (Pathe).—A story of the so-called oppression of a poor inventor by a capitalist. Happily everything is ultimately satisfactorily arranged, and the inventor receives his just recompense.

"Pepper Industry in the Malay Peninsula" (Pathe.)—An interesting travelogue made in that little known region whence comes a larger proportion of the pepper used in the civilized world. The strange appearing country, the natives and the processes of gathering and preparing the pepper are all clearly shown. It is an excellent piece of work and a worthy addition to the numerous good travelogues.

"An Aching Void" (Vitagraph).—A graphic sermon describing the conditions which exist in families where there are no children. Many who complain because of little people might get a new viewpoint if they saw this. It is a domestic tale which should have its influence upon those fortunate enough to see it.

"The Faithful Indian" (Essanay).—A western mining story in which a faithful Indian is made to play an important part. The story turns upon a loss of memory incident to the shock of an explosion and the return to consciousness by reason of another shock caused by a blow from the butt of a revolver. The picture includes the discovery of a rich strike of gold and the reward of the faithful Indian for protecting his master's interests.

"The Privateer's Treasure" (Gaumont).—An excellent picture, containing a number of thrilling scenes and much interesting scenery. The search for hidden treasure is always interesting and when the difficulties encountered are so clearly illustrated the picture acquires an interest it would not otherwise possess.

"Rocky Caves of France" (Gaumont).—An artistic reproduction of the picturesque caves near Lamoroux. Many travelers have seen them, but whether or not persons in the audience have seen them they will prove of extraordinary interest because of their wild and picturesque beauty.

"The Sheriff's Daughter" (Pathe).—One of those stories representing a sheriff's daughter as loving a bandit. Because of her plea the sheriff allows his prisoner to escape, but later, when he shoots his daughter, mistaking her for the desperado and she dies, he tears off his badge, realizing that his honor, too, is gone. Objection has been made to films of this character that show officers of the law as condoning offences, or allowing prisoners to escape. They make light of the law and are undesirable. In this instance, however, the sheriff is made to realize his position, thus vindicating the law. No objection can be made to such an ending.

"Davy Jones, or His Wife's Husband" (Vitagraph).—A sparkly comedy, graphically illustrating the woes of poor, unfortunate Davy. His experience with the card club is sufficient to keep the audience convulsed. And after his fake attack of hydrophobia, cured in a way that aroused his temper, he pays the penalty by very humorous practice of domestic science.

"The Department Store" (Edison).—Interesting because it depicts scenes which might actually occur in any department store in the land. The touch of nature, which prompts each one of the employees concerned to contribute something to the unfortunate girl's purse, makes the picture more than ordinary. This develops a heart interest, increased by the love affairs which appear later. There is much of life and action in the picture without any important dramatic force, unless it is accepted that the illustration of life itself, even in the humble walks here represented, is dramatic.

"Baby's Fall" (Edison).—A comedy including a number of absurdities which are unreal, but perhaps may be passed because they are lively and develop interesting situations.

A baby might fall into an awning, but it is extremely doubtful. Further, such a fall might lead to a disturbance approaching, or equalling, the one here represented, but it is unlikely, hence the picture may be admired chiefly for its absurdity. Admitting this it is good of its kind and rouses no end of sport before the matter in question is adjusted and the baby is pulled out of the awning to safety.

"The Diver" (Kalem).—An educational subject of interest. It shows with fidelity to facts the life of a diver and a sensational turn is given the picture by the blowing up of a wreck with dynamite. Very many have never seen a diver work, consequently this picture will be of educational value.

"The Hunter's Dream" (Kalem).—Almost anybody would reform after seeing all the horrors depicted in this imaginative film. Small wonder the hunter decides to eschew strong drinks and Welsh rarebits.

"Oh, You Kids" (Pathe).—This will carry the men back to their boyhood days and recall very vividly the time when they, too, used to snowball everyone in sight. The punishment they finally receive after leading the officers a merry chase will stimulate recollections of similar experiences that will assist in the general enjoyment of the picture. It is a boy picture and well indeed has the producer shown what boys actually do.

"The Paoli Brothers" (Pathe).—An excellent picture of this family of well known acrobats. The photography is excellent considering the difficulty of the subject.

"The Thames from Oxford to Richmond" (Urban).—An outdoor picture by this firm is always worthy of admiration and in this short length of film an excellent impression of the Thames can be obtained along some of its upper reaches. The views of the city of Oxford are well worth seeing and the same observation applies to the many notable sights along the course. The viewpoints were selected with skill and knowledge of artistic requirements, while the printer has done his portion of the work so well that all the negative contained is produced on the screen.

"Teaching Dad to Like Her" (Biograph).—A humorous warning to young men not to introduce thin show girl sweethearts to their fathers. In a film filled with humorous situations, humorous because they illustrate the young man's perturbations, the story of how father was so struck with the son's choice that the cards announce their marriage in the near future. The story is told with good accessories and does not fail to make a hit with the audience.

"Her Artistic Temperament" (Lubin).—A narrative of a country girl who imagined she could paint masterpieces and preferred life in the city wooing the fickle goddess of fame to washing dishes and ironing shirtwaists in her mother's kitchen. Disillusioned she is quite wiling to accompany her lover home when he calls for her. The story has no dramatic strength, but is interesting since it conveys a lesson which may have its influence upon other misguided individuals.

"Max is Stuck Up" (Pathe).—Another impossible Max comedy. It may be funny to get tangled up in fly paper, but it would be impossible for anyone to have such an experience as this. Max evidently has a peculiar sense of humor, but it would be better if it were directed into channels which are more in accord with the dictates of common sense.

"How Tommy's Wit Worked" (Pathe).—A boy story that has some amusing points. A few scenes are calculated to impress the middle-aged with a memory of similar experiences in the past, and some are wholly impossible.

"Her Words Came True" (Selig).—A comedy representing the experience of a gentleman with a gypsy fortune-teller and how her predictions came true, much too soon to suit him. The way he beats it when he has trouble with the dark woman, none other than the seeress herself, and two large men suddenly appear, is a fitting ending to a series of humorous adventures.

"The Test of Love" (Edison).—This theme has been utilized before, but never so satisfactorily. A blind girl is afforded means for having her sight restored by her ill-favored lover. He is fearful of the effect upon her when she sees him and induces his handsome brother to act in his place when the bandage is removed from the girl's eyes. The excellence in this picture lies in the fact that the girl is true to her lover, even though his features are not handsome. The play is filled with emotional scenes and holds the audience silent from the beginning to the end. The acting is sympathetic and strong in its simplicity and the beauty of character and strength of love are adequately exemplified.

"Han's Millions" (Essanay).—A lively German comedy, with Hans in the leading role. He is supposed to be heir to millions, consequently he is eagerly sought and accepted as a son-in-law by the thrifty grocer after he has been thrown out of the place. Imagine the family's consternation when they discover that his share is only one dollar.

"The Lieutenant's Wild Ride" (Gaumont).—The interest in the picture lies in the rush of the lieutenant to reach his command, after the discovery of the hidden telegram. The outdoor photography is clear and the action during the ride is thrilling.

"Though the Seas Divide" (Vitagraph).—A sentimental photoplay, offering suggestions in telepathy which are interesting, if they are largely improbable. That the song of a blind girl should be wafted across the seas and be caught up by the soul of a violinist is of the essence of poetic fancy. And later, when the violinist pursues this phantom and finds the girl seated on the shore still singing, they seem created for one another. It is one of the most poetic picture plays ever put on the screen, but there is a fascination about it which holds the attention all through, and when it disappears the audience scarcely realizes that it is no longer in the realm of fancy. The shock upon the return to practical is one of the attractive features of the film.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Field of Honor" (American).—A comedy which seemed to please the large audience where the writer saw it. Numerous laughable situations are developed, and the actors have seized their oppotunities to make them as funny as possible. The photography is good and much fun is developed before the film closes.

"Cain" (Eclair).—A graphic portrayal of the curse that follows murderers and has followed them since the first. This tragedy is intensified by the love story interwoven with it. The criminal confesses his guilt and plunges into the adjacent lake, completing a story which has some dramatic strength, but is too tragic for most motion picture audiences.

"The Rock Climbers" (Eclair).—A beautiful picture of the Pyrenees, showing their most famous peaks and following the guides as they climb up the steep rocks, or down into deep chasms. It is a graphic illustration of the way guides care for their charges in those mountains.

"The Open Gate" (Yankee).—A humorous love story, which has a prominent feature, the adventures of a sea captain whose hopes are dashed because he breaks his resolutions to be good. Years afterward, however, his sweetheart of former years has left the gate open, and, plucking up courage enough to enter, a wedding follows. It is a simple, clear and altogether delightful story, filled with those little touches which appertain to human nature as it actually is from day to day.

"In Old Madrid" (Imp).—Amid gorgeous settings and emphasized by good photography a pretty love story is told. The sensational scene where the lover carries the girl to the rocks in a roaring torrent will afford the audience a thrill. The way the consent and blessing of the objecting mother is obtained is unique and the story of much interest, even approaching the dramatic. "In Old Madrid" should prove a satisfactory addition to any program.

"Dogs not Admitted" (Lux).—A comedy representing how a man got even with a grouchy landlord for not allowing him to keep a dog. When the landlord pulled himself together after it had rained dogs, he had a fresh comprehension of the possibilities of getting even.

"Bill has Kleptomania" (Lux).—A humorous story illustrating the difficulties that accumulated around the afflicted one. He gathered in about everything loose and when finally arrested his wife meted out a business-like and presumably very effective punishment.

"Robert Emmet" (Thanhouser).—An interesting sketch of this famous Irish patriot, released for St. Patrick's day. It is well acted and well staged and a worthy picture in every sense. Robert Emmet and his misfortunes appeal to every patriot and whether a man be an Irishman or not this picture will arouse the best impulses of his nature. That he was captured because he went to see his sweetheart adds another romantic element which will make the picture even more attractive. The film gives a fair resume of the principal events in his dramatic life.

"His Double Treasure" (Yankee).—The story of a hidden treasure, found, then lost, almost at the moment of finding and recovered through the intervention of a pretty girl. And the romance closes with the young man getting both the girl and the treasure. The unexpected appearance of fierce brigands adds interest to a very satisfactory picture.

"The Sacrifice of Silver Cloud" (Bison).—An Indian picture which illustrates a thrilling fight and the sacrifice of an Indian girl's life because she warned the whites that her people were about to attack. The action is spirited and the photography is clear, representing a considerable advance in this respect over some pictures which have gone before.

"Between Love and Duty" (Great Northern).—A story of a doctor's unfortunate infatuation for a woman not his wife, the estrangement, the meeting of husband and wife at the sick bed of a patient and final reconciliation. The story is a simple narrative of a common enough domestic tragedy, but it ends happily, leaving a favorable impression of the picture and the actors.

"Life and People South of the Equator" (Great Northern).—An excellent reproduction of scenes among the nomadic tirbes in the torrid zone. Much instruction and entertainment is included in this film.

"Foolshead at Soiree" (Itala).—What this comedian does at a social function is humorously shown. As usual he thinks of very many strange stunts which would occur to no one else.

"Toto on the Stage" (Itala).—A comic presenting some fresh phases in unexpected action. Toto promises to be as much of a favorite as Foolshead.

"His Mind's Tragedy" (Powers).—Loss of memory appears as the motive of this picture. The doctor changes to a burglar, and becomes a common burglar. Later he comes to himself, while robbing a friend's house where his wife and daughter are staying and a joyful re-union follows. It is an excellent picture and the working out of this story is quite satisfactory.

"At Swords' Points" (Reliance).—A truly sumptuous production. It will rank as one of the best films the independents have ever released. One fault can scarcely be overlooked, however, the somewhat complicated character of the story. There are places where the real meaning of what is done seems somewhat obscure, yet the main thread is, perhaps, sufficiently clear so this defect should scarcely be considered. One of the most striking features ever introduced in motion pictures is the duel in the dark between the young king's mother, impersonated by Miss Marion Leonard, and the assassins who had come to murder him. The only light comes from the clashing of the steel as sword strikes sword in the blackness. The audience sat as though rooted to the spot while this life and death struggle was in progress. It is impossible to convey to those who have never seen it the strange, weird fascination which makes this scene one of the most notable ever seen on the screen. Another thriling scene is the battle. It is too realistic for comfort. And when it is over and the duke is thrown into prison the queen leads her son to the throne. It is all done with such a degree of realism that it is hard to think it is only a picture. The change in the film used by the firm is shown in the sharpness of the pictures and the stereoscopic relief which characterizes their appearance on the screen. Every detail of the beautiful costumes is reproduced and the sumptuous settings are produced so clearly and vividly that it seems impossible to offer a suggestion that is an improvement. The firm is to be congratulated upon this release which embodies all the attractive features of the best type of motion picture and sets a new mark for producers to reach in bringing out future subjects.

"Do You Know This Woman?" (American).—A comedy which affords Dott Farley an opportunity to disclose the stuff that laughs are made of. And right well is the task performed. It is a good comedy and one that will be appreciated by any audience.

"The Job and the Girl" (American).—A lively comedy detailing the adventures of a nervy young man. If you have never seen a display of pure nerve, now is your opportunity. It would be difficult to conceive anything funnier that some of the situations developed here.

"The Fisher Maid" (Imp).—An excellent film, telling a simple story of love and supposed deceit, with the added features of an attempted suicide undertaken in a picturesque manner. But all is made right at last and the little fisher maid is restored to her home through a thrilling rescue by her lover. Some of the scenes along the seashore are exceptionally good and are well worth while merely as pictures, quite apart from any connection they may have with the good story.

"Where the Shamrock Grows" (Rex).—A simple story of love, kidnapping and clever rescue of a young woman from the custody of a villain with the complete discomfiture of the aforesaid villain in the closing scene. The scenery is excellent and enhances the pictorial value of the film, while the actors perform their various parts with credit. It is a worthy addition to the films already put out by this house. Perhaps a considerable proportion of the strength of these pictures lies in the fact that the stories are simple and clearly told. The backgrounds are in harmony, while the photography is of a high standard.

"A Coward" (Ambrosio).—The story of a conscript who deserts in the hour of his country's peril and his wanderings afterward. When he does return he finds his wife married to someone else, and to complete the gloom he kills himself. Not a pleasant picture and rather difficult to understand by any of the standards of motion picture making. What benefit is derived from depicting the sorrows of a man in this way is beyond the comprehension of the average person.

"Adventures of a Countryman in Town" (Ambrosio).—A comic showing graphically the amusing features of the visit of a countryman to town. The last scene, with all of them flying away with Jones' huge umbrella, is a novelty that is sure to please.

"Just Kids" (Powers).—A story of the pranks of some children who ruined a number of things in their vigorous attempts to liven up matters about the house.

"A Trip About Christiania" (Powers).—A satisfactory scenic picture, showing much of interest about this northern city. The photographer has done his part well and the scenes selected are interesting.

"Divorce" (Thanhouser).—A serious attempt to illustrate upon the screen the divorce evil, and at the same time present in graphic form the influence a doll exerted in re-uniting the warring couple. The play is well staged and acceptably acted and its purpose makes it of more use than such plays ordinarily are.

"Waiting at the Church" (Thanhouser).—A comedy showing how Tommy won a wife, but lost at the same time. The mixup affords opportunity for much laughter.

Colored Motion Pictures.

By Henry.

The World's New England representative has noticed that the last eight months have witnessed less and less colored motion pictures which is not at all "as it should be." Furthermore, the colored films which have been placed on the market of late have in no instance reached the standard of quality set a year and more ago. Strange as it may seem, it has never been our good fortune, at any time, to have seen any colored motion picture equal to one we very vividly remember having witnessed at least two years back. The film we have in mind is one of Pathe's former masterpieces—"Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves." This film was a chef d'œuvre, with its beautiful colorings and delicate shades. An all but forgotten gem, it might be called. The reason wherefore the quality and quantity of colored motion pictures has declined is rather difficult to find. A close and minute questioning of a very good many of New England motion picture exhibitors shows us that the colored film is in request by the very great majority of motion picture theaters. Here again we find a repetition of that oft repeated chorus entitled, "The Manufacturers don't heed the exhibitors' needs!" The World's New England representative believes he may be able to show several reasons for the scarcity of colored cinematographs. In the first place: A colored picture costs considerable more to produce than the ordinary film. In the second place: the colored picture takes more expert attention and time than the ordinary film, and it is this age of ever increasing quantity output, this extra time needed, is to be seriously reckoned with. In the third place: we believe the scarcity of colored films is partly due to the fact that the manufacturers are overdoing—considerably overdoing—the black and white photography which formerly had much to do with the biograph superiority. The special attention (and consequent increase in sales, of course) attracted the serious attention of all manufacturers of motion pictures, both licensed and independent and then, from a clear sky, as it were, all tinted and colored motion pictures were practically seen no more. The motion picture manufacturers deluged the trade with "biograph black and white photography" as it is often named. New manufacturers sprang up who advertised stoutly the fact that in their films could be had this black and white shading of colors. The writer himself, pleads guilty to having a great partiality and indulgence for the black and white picture. If the truth be told, the perfect picture show for your Henry would consist mostly of pictures done in the biograph black and white, but not wholly. Perhaps most people who love the moving picture would declare in a like manner. But that does not mean that the public fancies being entirely fed on this one form of photography. Quite the contrary. Colored and tinted motion pictures are always a very welcome relief from the usual thing which, in this instance, is the black and white photographed picture. In a word, then, your Henry believes that, in their zeal to emulate the success made by the biograph in their photography, the great majority of all the manufacturers allowed every other form of photography slip away forgotten. This should now be rectified. The American manufacturers never made pretence to holding the palm where colored motion pictures were concerned; but the foreign film makers, especially Pathe, Gaumont, Ambrosco, Itala, Lux, etc., etc. should look this matter over with great attention.

We would never have written this article had we not known that the public is very well intentioned toward the colored picture. The men enjoy them; also the women and children (to whom all motion pictures appeal, so they tell us) especially lean toward them. To talk commercially, and not aesthetically, in dollars and cents, as it were, let the World's New England representative assure all manufacturers of motion pictures that any worthy colored release will be most welcome to exhibitors, which, of course, means good selling of the prints. Novelty of photography is just as essential as novelty of plots. Too much sameness in this regard tends to deaden the public's interest in the picture. This question can be looked into by the manufacturers with financial profit to themselves, leaving entirely to one side the general good it will do the industry. Who will rise to this emergency and win both money and reputation?

STORIES of the FILMS

MELIES.

SIR PERCY AND THE PUNCHERS.—The punchers of the XL outfit are wild with joy, cause Mary, the idol of the ranch, is coming home from college. Billy James is Mary's special friend and goes to bring her from the station—but, suffering snakes! big wasn't traveling with her, but alone "Sir Percy Granville," who owns the nearby ranch.

This gets Billy's goat for a time, but Mary rides and "razes" with the punchers, and soon shows them she is the same genuine, good-hearted Mary, and doesn't care a whoop for Sir Percy.

Sir Percy insists on sticking around, however, and shows his true nature by striking Mary's younger brother, Bobby, when he defends his sister from insult. Billy James is for performing Percy at once, but Mary is there with the ruling genius, and fixes up a better scheme to get rid of his lordliness. Mary arranges to elope with Percy, but Bobby, disguised as Mary, rides and does the stunt. Sir Percy swallows hook and all, and after a desperate ride to escape the pursuers, he reaches the preacher's home only to find his intended bride just married to Billy James, and that the latter at his side is Bobby, not Sir Percy. He is about to strike Bobby again, but Bobby has the sense to either drop on him, and makes him march out of the gate through a double row of punchers, each of whom contributes a whole soled kick to help him along to the tall grass.

BIOGRAPH.

PRISCILLA'S APRIL FOOL JOKE.—Paul is sitting with Priscilla on a secluded spot. Paul is reading to Priscilla, but she steals away to gather some flowers in the meadow. Paul sees and Harry are viewing this from a distance and when Priscilla has gone Alice conceives the idea of taking her place. When Priscilla returns she finds Paul being fondled by Alice. Ten thousand furies. Another lovers' quarrel ensues. Paul, innocent, tries to explain but Priscilla will not listen. However, the truth of the situation is learned and Priscilla is determined to get even by turning the laugh on the jokers. Both Paul and Priscilla leave notes in a conspicuous place purporting to their having each thrown over the other, leaving their wraps on the shore to apparently verify their act. They are now disguised by the maxim "He laughs best who laughs last."

CURED.—Our friend is decidedly under the weather from gout and rheumatism, and his invalid roller chair as a means of locomotion. Left alone, a thirst seizes him and leaving his chair he hies himself for a drink. He has hardly departed when Happy Jack enters and decides to take a ride. This proves to be a most exciting trip, bumping into objects and human beings, and a wild flight of stairs to the very edge of the wharf facing the sea. Here he finds the chair empty, and the invalid him, so he vamps. The invalid finds this point a most attractive one at which to sit and enjoy the cool breezes of the ocean, and here he sits. Shortly after those into whom Happy Jack in his peregrinations has run approach mutinously and thinking the man in the chair is Jack, pounce upon him and overboard he goes. With him it is now a case of kill or cure.

THE SPANISH GYPSY.—Pepita was anxious to avenge herself upon Jose for the jilt she suffered. Jose is a handsome toreador and knowing he and Pepita meet it is love at first sight. They go to the Grand Plaza, where they sing and dance. Jose was debonair and fascinating, and the pretty face and trim figure to make him forget the very existence of Pepita. Subsequently Pepita declares the weak Jose from Pepita for herself, and together they go to the Plaza. Paula, the busybody, seeing Jose and Pepita together, runs to Plaza bastions to inform Pepita, who goes armed with a dagger to kill Jose. In this she is thwarted by several bystanders. Jose cowardly hastens to a distant camp where he feels he will be safer from Pepita's wrath. Jose is examining a pistol he is about to procure with which to protect himself, when the firearm explodes and blinds Andrea. In this helpless condition, Mariana cruelly deserts him. Feeling that he has been justly punished for his perfidy, he wanders off to join a band of gypsies for a livelihood. Unknowingly he returns to the old neighborhood and while playing on the highway, Paula passes and with her usual spitefulness runs off to inform Pepita of Jose's return to the village. Rushing madly through the village, Pepita espies Jose alone on the road singing. As Pepita approaches with drawn dagger she at once sees his helpless condition and pity melts her hatred and her love for him revives. She assures him by taking his hand and kissing it, leading him to the safety of the camp, declaring that her love for him is fortitude enough for her to sacrifice herself to the care of him throughout his dark and cheerless life.

SELIG.

1861.—Those memorable words had just died upon the lips of the grand old general, as he gave lieutenant Allen orders to reach Thomas. In order to do this he had to pass through the heart of the enemy's country. Both men realized the excessive danger, and the younger officer salutes and leaves upon his mission. The message delivered, returning, the lieutenant finds himself in close quarters. He forgets illness and is cared for at the home of Virginia Johnson, the sister of Robert E. Johnson, who is at the front.

She unexpectedly receives a message from her brother, saying he will visit them that night. Allen, fearful of recognition even though he is disguised in Confederate uniform, plans his escape, only to be followed and captured. Later in battle Johnson and Allen are wounded and Johnson, feeling the end was near, places a little miniature in the hands of the Union soldier and asks him to find her. He recognizes it as that of Virginia, and then—"the heart of the rebel gray beats close to the stronger one of Union blue."

GAUMONT.

HIS IMAGE IN THE WATER.—A rich old farmer falls in love with the daughter of a poor neighbor. He overwhelms the maiden with presents. The mother is flattered and promises him the hand of her daughter who has already given her heart to a young man.

When the old man learns of this affair he decides upon swift revenge. His heart is touched by the happiness of the lovers and he decided not only to give them his idea of consent but to make the couple a very substantial present.

This action is brought about by his seeing in a stream the reflection of his own wrinkled face and white hair.

FAMILY TROUBLES.—A clever comedy built upon the domestic troubles of more than more thoughtful of strangers than of one another. Through two family quarrels many very laughable events come to pass.

THE SECRET OF THE FOREST.—The Baron Berke carries all Republicans because his ancestors were executed of all trade by the Jacobins.

Jean, his daughter, is in love with a Republican's son and begs her father to plead mercy for the hand of Jean, but the baron refuses to part with her.

The Republican puts some money in a box, together with a ring Jean has given to his son; this box they bury in a forest and send a gypsy to tell Jean of the treasure is buried. The baron unearths the treasure, finds the ring, and sees through the gypsy's artifice. All ont give in at first, he finally capitulates, and the couple fly to each other's arms.

TRIUMPHANT OF JIGGERS.—The laughable experiences of the well-known comedian, Jiggers. He buys a new hat which proves to be haunted. It's many mysterious disappearances, its flitting down the street, bumping into people, crawling through keyholes, and leaping a half hundred feet unassisted, make up a remarkable film.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

DR. CHARCOT'S TRIP TOWARD THE SOUTH POLE.—Pictures recorded by the camera obtained during two years' explorations in the Antarctic by Dr. Charcot, the eminent French explorer. Launching the "Pourquoi Pas," "Pourquoi Pas," specially built for the purpose, is shown, and its departure from Havre amid scenes of great excitement. Buenos Ayres, Chili, is the last port of call before the explorers plunge into the unknown.

The first polar photograph is of an ice-bound sea—a phase often met with in geography books, but nothing found in real life can duplicate this picture. It is a stupendous spectacle to see the ocean locked in the grip of the frozen north under the ice-floes which encumber it. Navigation in such waters may well be dangerous.

Wonderful pictures of these floes and floats follow, enabling the spectator to visualize the immense expanse of snow and ice. A sledging expedition is seen setting out, and delightful photographs of thousands of penguins—almost the only inhabitants of the Antarctic—conclude a most interesting subject.

THE CORMORANTS OR JAPANESE CATCHING FISH WITH BIRDS.—Cormorants performing a very curious method adopted by the Ainos, the Japanese aborigianls, to catch fish, and illustrating the unexpected forms the ingenuity of half-civilized peoples often takes. Cormorants prey upon fishes, plunging their long necks beneath the waves and rarely failing to "get a bite." No one not a savage would have thought of turning this trait to account, but nothing is simpler than the way the Ainos do. Each fisherman sets out in a boat with a little covey of cormorants which he keeps under control by a string attached to their necks. One is reminded of the fairy stories in which folk travel in boats drawn by swans. With a mighty splashing and spattering the cormorants get to work and the second purpose of the strings round their necks is then apparent. The birds cannot swallow the fish they have caught. When a bird has caught two or three, the fishermen unceremoniously drag them to the boats—a little pressure scientifically applied and the cormorants are obliged to disgorge. They seem to take it quite as a matter of course, and in time learn not to swallow the fish even if their necs are not tied.

VITAGRAPH.

THO' THE SEAS DIVIDE.—A young and beautiful blind girl living on the borders of the sea in a distant country, singing in the moonlight a sonata, which echoes and reaches across the sea wafted in waves of sound and melody to the reception room of a great mansion where a famous violinist is playing an intermezzo, the sweet chords of the sonata that is being sung by the girl intermingles with the soothing strains of the intermezzo. He forsakes all and goes on and on, searching until he reaches the home of the blind girl, and the two are united in love's embrace.

THE WIDOW VISITS SPRIGTOWN.—The widow and her cousin Ned at Sprigtown bar hait is golden, she calls it auburn, tis false. She is bald. The cousin's plan to show the young beaus of Sprigtown how they have been fooled by the charming widow.

When Ned arrives they take her wig and throw it out of the window, make a fire in a can outside her chamber door, cry fire, and the fires fire department, which all the boys in town are members, hoping that when they come to rescue the widow they will get her baldness. She has an admirer, lame, fat and fifty, he finds her wig beneath her window, restores it and saves her from ignominy of detection. The dremes arrive, conduct her to safety and she rewards each with a golden coin.

A LITTLE LAD IN DIXIE.—John Lawton, a Confederate soldier, is given a home leave to recover from his wounds. His little son Ralph, a mountain lad of eight, is inspired with the martial spirit of the times, and when his mother makes him a little Confederate flag, he takes his father's musket and stations himself at a mountain pass, appointing himself its guardian. With Song Riley, he defends the pass. Sings to them shortly afterwards Bud reels and falls, mortally wounded, across his feet. Another little lad and girl, sing, she lifts him tenderly on her arm and smooths his brow. Reverently covering him with the Confederate flag, the Union soldiers withdraw fully gazing at the form of the manly little hero.

PATHE.

THEIR MOTHER.—Tom and Ralph Stone are greatly attached to each other until Ralph wins Tom's sweetheart, Bella, from him. Another, whose death they both had witnessed together, stays Tom's hand when he attempts to kill Ralph. Failing in this, Tom plans to kill him and forget it. Two years later in his little 'dobe house Tom reads that Ralph is going into bankruptcy, being completely ruined. He laughs he knows that his old sweetheart is now Ralph's wife, Tom sends to his brother a letter enclosing $1,500 the file immediate needs and telling him of a good foreman's job at McAllister's ranch in Idaho, near Tom's home. Ralph and his wife and baby are at the breakfast table when Tom, masked to prevent recognition, calls. Mrs. Ralph, mother of Ralph's house in an effort to get a glimpse of his old sweetheart, Ralph seeing the masked man, unbuckles his gun and starts to take up on him, but Tom makes his escape. Ralph and the rest of the boys mount their horse and give pursuit, finally catching the fugitive, and are about to string him up in the summary justice which was meted out to horse thieves in those bygone days, when Ralph recognizes his brother. He stays the execution, of course, and the vision of their now sainted mother rising before their eyes, they are once more united in brotherly love.

LOVE IN MADRID.—Juanita finds Mr. Carmen is seen by a very dashing chap as she passes the market place on her homeward way. Juanita drops a fresh kitchen bouquet at his feet. Later in the day Enrique manages to get a note to Juanita asking her to attend a dance that evening, and she very gladly consents. After stealing away from the house she meets her new-found sweetheart at the dance and entertains the entire company with the beautiful "Jota." Her wonderful grace leads a bystander to attempt to make her acquaintance, which is promptly resented by Enrique, and it ends in a duel, in which Enrique is the victor. Juanita's father coming in about this time and seeing the end of the fight, and learning that it is for his daughter's sake, readily consents to the marriage of the happy pair.

A FATAL RESEMBLANCE.—Little Paul is desperately ill and the doctor sends Paul's father to the dispensary post haste for some medicine. On the way the poor fellow is arrested as a clever forger, whom he chances to resemble. Though protesting his innocence, he is thrust into a cell and the great trouble causes him to lose his mind. So he is confined in an asylum for sixteen years. Paul in the meantime has been adopted by the man who caused his father's arrest, not knowing that Paul was his victim's son, and Paul is now a grown man and has taken the name of his adopted parent. The poor unfortunate about this time regains his reason and is dismissed from the asylum. One of the first persons he meets is his own son, who attempts to aid the poor old chap by taking some food to his house. In his father's room he gives the old fellow his card, which instantly recalls the scene of sixteen years ago. Thinking to be avenged on the man who caused him so much misery, the real father attempts to kill his son. How he finds out the boy's real identity and how he is saved from this terrible crime makes a story of such dramatic interest that it would be a shame to spoil it by telling it in advance.

ATHALIAH.—After having murdered forty-two of her household, Athaliah has at last seated herself securely (as she thinks) upon the throne of Judea. The film story opens with Athaliah attempting to resist the appeals of the priests of Baal to take the temple. Her subjects are tired of her cruelty and tyranny and this feeling of unrest is spread to her army, and one of her captains, Abner, though still in the service of Athaliah, is secretly on the side of the High Priest. One prince of the house of Ahab escaped Athaliah's slaughter, however, and this little Joash has been raised in the House of the Lord by the High Priest Jehoiadeth. One night Athaliah is frightfully haunted by the spirits of her victims, and in a paroxysm of terror she imagines she sees the figure of little Joash with a raised sword in his hand, and the picture is so realistic that she gives the final order to attack on the temple. Abner refuses to lead her troops, so the cruel queen takes the field herself and, followed by her army, advances upon Jerusalem. Arriving at the temple she is invited to enter by the High Priest, and this she does unaccompanied. When within the sacred portals she sees the child she has reason to dread seated on a little throne surrounded by the faithful. In rage and hatred Athaliah attempts the life of Joash, but is suddenly surrounded by the soldiers of the new king. Athaliah would have been killed on the spot, but "Jehoiadeth the High Priest hath said, Thou shalt not kill in the House of the Lord." So the unhappy queen is allowed to make her escape, but once without the temple she is pierced by a hundred spears. Twelve heralds, with gleaming trumpets, proclaim the new king, who is brought forth by the High Priest and held up for the admiration of his subjects.

HER CHILD'S HONOR.—Unable to bear the abuse of her drunken soldier husband the wife left her home and went to the city, where she became a nurse in a hospital. Her husband, recovering from a spree, treated his wife's disappearance as a joke and soon went with his company to the Philippines. Meantime a doctor at the hospital had fallen in love with the young wife and when news came from the Philippines that her husband had been killed she married him. They were very happy and a child was born to them. To a friend in her old home she sent a photograph of herself and family. Then her soldier husband returned for he had not been killed. Imagine his surprise at her new home to appeared on the scene. A dance was in the air, but being unable to keep the engagement, the wife had prepared to perform the dance herself. The appearance of her soldier husband greatly excited her for it made her second marriage illegal. She thought of her baby who was playing innocently in his little bed, but she determined to go on with the dance. It was a weird, oriental dance and the dancer held in her hand a long dagger. Though you cannot see this in the picture the end finds her cruel soldier husband and herself mortally wounded. Then with her last breath she was married again by the doctor and died happy, knowing that her child's honor was saved.

WHEN WOMEN STRIKE.—When John Matthews' wife was called out on strike by the suffragettes he proceeded to take it philosophically. He secured a pretty French maid and installed her as housekeeper. When he returned home for lunch he was pleased to see how daintily it had been prepared. Just at this time a messenger arrived from suffragette headquarters, asking him if he was willing to arbitrate. Mr. Matthews gave the messenger the merry ha, ha, and sent back word that he was quite satisfied with things as they were.

When Mrs. Matthews received this message she rushed from the room—nor was she stayed by the cries of "Deserter!" which followed her. Arriving at her home she saw through the window how contented her husband was with the French maid waiting upon him.

That was enough—the strike was over so far as Mrs. Matthews was concerned. She went into the dining-room and weepingly told her husband that she was sorry. Mr. Matthews smiled a happy smile; the maid was dismissed and peace was restored.

The latter gives orders to have the tenement renovated and remodeled, has the mother taken to the hospital, Clara is spared to him, and upon her recovery he takes her to the magnificent tenement, where we find the Rentfast family living happily under the greatly improved conditions.

THE TEST OF LOVE—Henry Harris and his ward, Edith, who has been blind since her birth, are devotedly attached to each other. While reading the daily paper to her one day he sees an article about an eminent German oculist. Henry finally yields to her importunities and agrees to take her to New York to the great oculist. The operation is a very expensive one, and he finds that his meager savings are not sufficient to defray the cost, so he borrows to his brother.

Upon arriving at the city he gives Henry what little ready cash he has, and with this as a beginning Henry goes back home to raise the balance. After borrowing from all his friends he still finds himself short a considerable amount, which he finally raises by pawning everything of value that he owns. He passes for the operation and it brings Edith home in triumph.

Once at home the old fear of losing her returns and, as the time approaches for the removal of the bandages from Edith's eyes, the strain becomes too great and a plan finally presents itself to his anxious mind, he sends for his handsome brother. Upon the arrival of the brother, Henry explains his fears and begs his brother to take his place when the bandage is removed from Edith's eyes, that she may not know. He tells her Henry wasn't she sees before her. Realizing Henry's great love for Edith, the brother finally consents. He removes the bandage and passes before her to await the result. With a cry of love and joy she rushes into his arms. For the man before her, only to recoil in alarm as he answers; the voice is not Henry's! Slowly approaching him again, she closes her eyes and runs her fingers over his face; the features are not Henry's. Panic-stricken, she starts to rush from the room, only to come face to face with Henry, who speaks to her and she at once recognizes Henry's voice and, shading her eyes with her hands, passes her hands over his face to assure herself that she is not mistaken; the features are those of Henry, and she is enfolded in the arms of her lover.

WHO GETS THE ORDER!—A wholesale customer, who is to the market for a large order of goods, visits identical stores in the two concerns who have bidden for it, promising his order, as the prices and quality are the same, to whichever representative reaches him first.

Blinks and Jinks, the two salesmen, both renounced "knights of the grip" and both confident of success, leave their respective offices at most of the railroad depot, where they discover that their destinations are identical. Both of them begin a contest of wits to win the coveted prize. Blinks, having purchased his ticket first, is awaiting his competitor in order to be able to keep an eye on him. His ticket, held carelessly in his hand, is stolen from him by a pickpocket, whom he chases, but of no avail. Realizing that he might miss his train, he rushes madly back just in time to catch the train as it is pulling out. Not wishing to pay his fare twice, he slips into the seat with Jinks and while the latter's attention is momentarily distracted, slyly transfers the ticket to the train check in his competitor's hat.

The conductor, taking the tickets the second time and seeing Jinks without a check, begins an argument which results in the latter's ejection from the coach and a ride outside in the platform. Blinks, exultant in his apparent victory, continues on his journey until the engine is inexplicitated and he is forced to walk, to the great disgust and the intense amusement of his fellow passengers. While walking he encounters a tramp, similarly looking tramp, who relieves him of his hat and coat. Despondently he walks the track and upon reaching a crossing, sees, to his delight, his competitor madly riding by on a bicycle which he had invigled a country lass into lending to him.

In the course of events Blinks strikes a man in an automobile to take him to town; Jinks, who meanwhile has met with an accident, is forced, works upon the sympathies of a wagon driver, and after a series of complicated situations they reach the customer almost at the same moment. The customer is nonplussed for the moment but finally divides his order, giving half to each, which results in a happy termination of their desperate struggles, and they all go out to have a drink together.

THE DISREPUTABLE MR. RAEGEN.—The first scene shows his entrance into a saloon and that the police officials know the man and his unenviable reputation. Inside the saloon a young collector carelessly displays a roll of bills in his wallet, and in paying his bill for drinks slips the wallet into the back pocket of his trousers. An either habitue of the saloon, a man by the name of Smith, feigning to drop its hat, deftly picks the pocket of the young collector and slips the empty wallet, after removing the bills, into Raegan's pocket.

Of course the alarm is spread, and in a tremendously exciting scene, in which Smith puts out the lights, the place is raided by the police. Smith has escaped.

We see Smith return to his flat in a tumble-down tenement and display the money which he has brought to his old mother and to the little child of the story. The child is hungry and cries for food. Suddenly they hear a noise outside; it is the police! Stopping the child's cries, they put her into a closet, and closing the door, make their escape by way of the fire escape. The police break in the room, make a hurried search, and dudley go one there disappear.

Shortly afterwards we see Reegan darting around the corner, lastly pursued by other police, and entering this same building. Climbing upstairs rapidly, he finds the door open and slips into Smith's apartment, closing the door after him. Hearing a noise in the closet, he raises a chair to defend himself, when the door opens and the tiny little waif appears.

Not at all quite unconscious of any danger in the supposed bad man and makes friends with him at once, asking him to give her food. Raegan makes a search of the premises, finds bread and anything to give her. He decides to forage outside, but on looking out of the window on the front, finds police on guard on the sidewalk below watching the building. The same state of affairs holds true at the back of the tenement, and finally the little child suddenly collapses in a dead faint upon the floor from hunger.

This is too much for the heart of Raegan, and picking her up in his arms he goes downstairs, presents himself to the police and bids them to take him to the station, where something can be had for the child to eat, of course in the meantime Raegan has been identified by the saloon and his person and Raegen's innocence is proven, and having turned over a new leaf, we see him in the last scene—Raegan and the waif and the little wolf, who had been abandoned by her grandmother when she fell into the hand of the law.

JIM THE MULE BOY.—"Jim, the Mule Boy," the sole support of his blind father and a mother and small child, is stopped at the entrance to the mine into which he is driving the mule by the young son of the owner of the mine. The lad wants to ride on a mule and Jim refuses to let him on the ground. Jim puts him off laughingly, but while he is attending to his lunch the small boy hides upon the back of the mule and thus Jim becomes a passenger. When Jim discovers him, down in the farthest recesses of the mine, he starts at once to take him back to the surface to his father.

Then an explosion occurs, and we see the walls of the shaft fall in, blocking the exit of the boys and practically entombing them. Above ground the father misses his little son and starts in search. Is faced by the same explosion. He summons a rescue party to begin work at once. We then follow the successive scenes as the days and hours slip by, the rescuers working with might and main, while the imprisoned boys, having had supply of food and becoming weak and exhausted when finally it gives out and they are left without food or water.

We see the mule eating the straw from his collar and Jim digging a hole in the coal, which a little water creeps, which he gathers in his cap and gives to his small charge, keeping for himself only enough to wet the cap after he has squeezed it as dry as possible. Then the boys abandon hope and the little lad offers up a prayer to the Father above.

In the middle of it Jim's practiced ear hears a sound in the distance. The blows of a pick on sound far off in the earth. When finally the wall of rock is tumbled down and the rescuers' heads appear, Jim and the boy cease to lift their prayer to greet them. But of course they are borne quickly to the surface, and the proprietor rewards Jim not only with a deed for a home for his father and promise of steady work for himself, but also with a handsome watch, which probably more dearly prized than the house and lands.

The girl sees them coming and implores her father to get into the wagon, but he refuses and the girl, knowing that she must act quickly if she would save her own life, springs into the wagon, seizes the reins and urges the horses to their utmost speed. After a long and thrilling ride in which the Indians endeavor to overtake her, she is joined by the friendly cowboy, who sends a crony who was with him, to a neighboring ranch for help. The girl and cowboy rave the Indians and pull up at a deserted ranch which they protect themselves against the Indians until the arrival of the ranchmen, who disperse the Indians. He is accompanied home by an detective who leads him to his room and sleeps just outside the door, with the key in his pocket. The next morning he takes to court where he is sentenced to thirty days in jail. Fitzy is alarmed for fear his wife will find out the matter and sends a note to Warren telling her he has been called to Mexico for thirty days. rapidly, and being friendless, by his own choice, naturally becomes a miser. He places his earnings near the fireplace, so that it is always near him. Dunstan, the worthless son of the Squire, spies him one night, and when Silas is out of the house for a few minutes, Dunstan slips in and takes the gold. Making his escape in the dark, Dunstan slips and tumbles into a nearby stone pit.

His loss almost unhinges the reason of Silas. He falls asleep before his fire one night, and dreams that his gold has returned. Opening his eyes, he rushes forward to reclaim it. He is doomed to disappointment. The "gold" is the hair of a village girl. Her adoring lover managed to reach the door-step of Silas, and there fell dead. Her plight touches the heart of the old weaver. In later years he had occasion to bless his choice. For the little girl, as she grew to womanhood, became a loving and affectionate daughter.

In the course of time the old stone pit was drained out, and workmen solved the mystery of the robbery. Dunstan's skeleton was found, with the bags of money nearby. The adopted daughter brings the money to Silas. For a moment he clutches the coins eagerly. Then he casts them aside and turns to the girl. He realizes that he is no longer Silas Marner, the miser, but a man who has reason to be happy and grateful. Once he thought that money meant everything in the world, but now he understands that the shining heap of gold is not worth one strand of his daughter's sunny hair. The money is here, safe in his, and he knows now that love is a treasure no miser can buy.

THE IMPOSTOR.—John Reed, a Northern man who has lived in the South for many years before the Civil War, enlists under the banner of the Confederacy when hostilities break out. Outside his relatives in the North, he is alone in the world except for his daughter, who is just budding into young womanhood.

May follows her father to the front as a nurse, and when he is mortally wounded, he is brought to the hospital to which she is assigned. A camp follower, a woman, has been brought there on a charge of being a spy, and hears the dying message of Reed. He leaves his daughter to his cousin, a Northern woman she has never seen, and asks her to be good to May for his sake, as the girl is alone in the world. Later when the two women are alone with the dead, May is struck by a shrill and squeakily stilted. The spy seeing a chance to escape, takes the letter from May, disguises herself in the clothing of the supposed dead girl, and goes North, where she is warmly greeted by the family, who take for a relative.

May is found by the Union troops, who have captured the Intrenchment, and a doctor discovers that she is not dead. Her recovery is slow however, and before she has a chance to go North, the impostor has firmly settled herself with her cousin, who believes her implicitly. In fact she desires to see her married to her son, although he is not inclined to the union.

When May arrives, shabby and pale, she is determined as an impostor. But her courage and the outrage! Fortunately for May, however, the child of a neighbor has overheard the impostor offer May a sum of money to go away, and at the same time, believing herself alone, has sneeringly admitted that she is stifling mother false stories, but declares that her victim cannot prove it. May is just about to be turned away a second time, despite the sympathy of John, who is half inclined to believe her story, when the boy confronts the impostor, and his evidence together with a severe cross-examination by the indignant John, forces her to confess her fraud, and leave the home where she has no right. May kisses the child who has aided her, and is grateful to the man who proved himself a friend when everyone else made haste to disown her.

AMERICAN.

THE PENALTY.—The weak woman is disclosed surrounded by home ties, a loving husband and a prattling infant. Business cares demand the husband's attention in the city. He fondly embraces his wife and takes his departure. The fond mother's attention is directed to her little one. She is engaged in making the baby's moments contented and happy when the frivolous woman appears upon the scene.

She describes the joy one can get out of life by becoming familiar with its worldly side. The poor, weak wife yields and leaving the baby in the midst of its toys, she saves the home in company with her frivolous friend. The two women are next disclosed entering a palace of chance.

Dropping into more and more expensive resorts, both are soon engrossed in play. Fortune favors the poor, weak wife. Encouraged by the luck which attended her first effort, the wife continues in her suit for fortune, cold and indifferent to her husband and child, she becomes a slave of the God of Chance. Until finally absorbed wholly, she risks her last jewels. The husband intervenes at a critical moment, and his magnanimity forgiveness saves the unhappy woman, and she sinks into his arms.

THE JOB AND THE GIRL.—A young man is out of employment. He reads in the want column a request for the services of a private secretary to a wealthy business man. Feeling that he is just the man for the job, he answers in person, and in order to assert emphatically his fitness for the office, without asking for the position, simply takes it. This is a display of rather more of the necessary aggressiveness than the old man expected and he orders the aspirant from his office. He leaves the office indignantly with the young man in charge, and meeting the janitor, orders him to throw the intruder out of the place. The new secretary is determined to prove his qualification and promptly locks the janitor in the large office vault. He works good, only setting up for a moment when he meets his employer's daughter. A mutual impression is formed on each side. The young people seek to reconcile the father to the inevitable, and in order to secure an uninterrupted field are compelled to lock the irate parent in the vault as well.

A license is hastily secured, the two are married, and come back for the necessary blessing. The old man is loudly indicted to grace his parening.

DO YOU KNOW THIS WOMAN?—With the husband's departure to the business, comes a promise to receive series for the movies that you write.

Pleased with the idea at the first thought, one of the most scrupulous plot-hunters the movies an effort to secure such. For two days and nights she toils the home to such a degree that she is neglected. The husband visits the different studios in the play of plausible excuses. After some time she succeeds in presenting two at an extraordinary price. He places them carelessly in his pocket, comes to his office.

He hastens homeward. Dinner is hastily dispatched, and longing to peruse the scenes in shortly to fashionable, and would therefore in the evening paper. The wife's frantic attempts of refusal to allow him to read have exhausted her patience, and she is in no mood. Now is husband to her complete mystification, and at once seeks her husband.

He is scanning the paper. She calls to him. He answers shiftily. Now, she knows, something is half-past eleven. She has exhausted the patience between wives and movies. Something a wife can't stand is a husband.

THE FIELD OF HONOR.—Love supersedes for the hand of a young lady. Cowardly Cuthbert, penniless and of low knowledge. Jack's attentions are received by the young lady in question. Jack writes a challenge, apparently from the captain to the rejected. He destroys the letter in the frightened coward himself, and summons the colonel to answer the note. He writes, assuming tone of commanding and daring him to meet him in mortal combat. Jack delivers this to the captain, and persuades him that it is his duty to call the colonel's bluffs, which he does when convinced that no encounter will ensue.

Jack has taken into his confidence several friends. They prepare everything for the duel. A brace of pistols are loaded up with tobacco smoke. The unwilling combatants are placed face to face and at a signal the terror-stricken heroes fire. They are too frightened to consider any alternative but sudden death, and when shattered with the smoke both feel Jack has, meanwhile, allowed the lady to believe that her foolish flirtations have led to disastrous consequences. She arrives at the field, discovers the joke and leaves very much incensed. Jack has some difficulty in making her see the absurd side of the case, but wins out.

THE HAREM SKIRT.—This picture depicts the experiences of a wearer of the harem skirt. She passes a couple of boys who trail after. A crowd gathers, and the urchins, examining minutely the texture of the new harem skirt much for the same, attract her attention to such wise that she turns around, sees the crowd following, and with a view to escaping the undesired attention of her mudcled admirers, starts to run away from them.

She eventually arrives home where she finds that she has forgotten an important social engagement with some social friends of hers, and in consternation ascertains that she will not have an opportunity of changing her costume and experiences after leaving the dress making shop, however, have been such that she hesitates to appear in the presence of her friends in her present attire, so she compromises by donning an ordinary walking skirt which virtually hides the bizarre effect of the new innovation.

In her new commonplace attire, she attends the reception being given in her honor, and from this point in the reel to the end, the situations are unique, original, and above all extremely funny. On account of the peculiar construction of her harem skirt, the lady naturally is not afraid of mice and accounts her friends at her fortitude in the presence of the small enemy.

The reception is virtually broken up by the cry of fire and the advantages of the harem skirt are fully set forth in the ease with which our comical heroine descends the fire escape.

The lady of the harem skirt eventually returned home to her husband, who has been awaiting her arrival for a couple of hours, getting quite sarcastic, and who is prepared to reprimand her severely, but upon seeing the apparition that confronts him upon her sauntering unconcerned into the sitting room, faints away.

NESTOR.

THE TRUTH.—Wilton Gray was innocent of forging his firm's name, so strong was the circumstantial evidence against him, that the attorneys for Messrs. Black & Chapin succeeded in having him convicted.

Left with little Rosie to provide for, Mary Gray made a noble struggle to obtain employment, but to each place which she applied, either it was already taken or the young mother was incapable of filling it.

At last, through Rev. John Chapman's advice, a typewriter was sent up and Mary started typewriting in earnest. But so anxious was she to get to work, that long before she was capable of holding a position, the clergyman obtained a situation for her at Crosby & Adams. However, although willing to stretch a point to oblige their pastor, Mary's inexperience was so apparent that they were forced to let her go. But, fortunately, Mr. Adler, her kind-hearted boss, found time in informing the clergyman of what had occurred. Accordingly, upon his housekeeper's advice, Mary and little Rosie were brought to the parsonage and it was not long before the mother was able to act as amanuensis for her friend.

All would have gone well had not Martha Higgins and Carrie Little happened in as the clergyman was writing the letter. Upon seeing the hysterical outburst of joy when she learned that the real forger had confessed and that Wilton would be with her soon. Not waiting to learn the cause of the scene, the gossips hastened to the elders of the church with their tale, and, as a result, Rev. John Chapman was solemnly waited upon by a scandalized committee, who sorrowfully demanded his explanation.

Quietly the clergyman motioned his accusers to the sitting-room door, then, softly drawing aside the curtains disclosed to their astonished gaze—the Gray family, Wilton, Mary and Rosie, oblivious to all else, save their joy at being united.

LUX.

THE GREED OF GAIN.—Jean Morgan, a rich old farmer, is as hard on his son as he is on his employees, and the former receives his wages in the same manner as the workmen. It is by this that Jacques appeals to his father for more money. He is told that is all that he will get during Jean's lifetime. As Jacques broods over this treatment, his wife steals up to him and sneeringly asks how much longer he is going to be content with such a share. The taunt arouses the young man, and the next morning, when father and son are out on the lake, Jacques pushes the older man into the water. Soon the news spreads 'round that old Jean Morgan is drowned, and the workpeople, in their rough way, express their sympathy. But Jacques ignores them, for remorse has come to him and he sits gazing in the fire, muttering senseless words. A year elapses, and on the day of his father's death Jacques is forcibly reminded of his crime by the sight of his wife sitting at the table paying the workpeople. The woman has grown hard and unfeeling—that is her part of the punishment. But when she finds that her husband has gone, she rushes after him. She comes upon him as he is firing a gun at an imaginary person, and turning, he regards her with hate. Throwing himself upon her, he curses his bygone round her throat, and closer and closer they stagger to the water's edge. Then struggling fiercely, husband and wife fall into the lake side by side, and after a few minutes, calmly settle and flow evenly over their heads.

THE WANTED A HOOP.—Charles is greatly pleased at the sight of a little girl trolling a hoop, and promptly decides to go in for the sport. Finding her with a number in his box, purposes to take the pin out of a carriage-wheel, that he may use the latter for a hoop, but alas! calloy secures a fairy, the wheel comes off, the carriage falls on one side, and Charles is roughly handled. His next attempt is a bicycle wheel, which he "borrows" from a shop. Gleefully, he sends it spinning down the road, but unfortunately it gets beyond control, and Charles and wheel come in for a bag full of coal-dust. Nothing daunted, he takes advantage of a milkman's hot box, purposes a ride, and, in turn is also upset. Then he tries the power of a sewer, which dashes off in its own direction, and Charles, left in the lurch, in turn he is also pursued and finally seeks refuge in the sewer. He is at length rescued and the latter scene comes under the ban of the police, who open a shop in which hoops are prominently displayed. He makes a raid on the premises, smashes them up and then has to settle with a particularly irate proprietor.

IMP.

THE MAZE OF FATE.—Joseph Kane is a drunkard. Ruby, his daughter, shares his shame. Kane's home life is unhappy. Ruby loves Stevens freely. Ruby enters and tries to persuade her father to leave the place. He refuses.

Charles Stevens, a young lawyer, finds her standing at the door of the saloon, heart-broken. Stevens, who is addicted to strong drink, enters the place, drinks, and goes out unsteady on his legs.

The men implicated in the murder of Ida Karn lift upon the scheme to implicate the inoffensive Kane. They throw the body of Karn on the floor and Kane is found in a drunken stupor. Bloody waste placed in the hand of the drunken man. Kane is charged with the murder.

Ruby engages Stevens to defend the accused. He visits Kane in prison and obtains from him the story of the cold man protesting innocence. Ruby implores Stevens to save her father.

Stevens recognizes the impossibility of clearing the old man in the court and, taking a cane in his hands. He visits the saloon, accompanied by the marshal, and forces a confession from "Red" Doolin at the muzzle of a revolver. Kane is acquitted and Ruby is grateful and her love for Stevens is now unbounded. She loves Stevens, and he gives her his photograph, which she carries away reverently.

Red Doolin has incurred the enmity of the pals of the men who have been punished for the murder of Karn. Stevens is surprised while seated near Ruby. He is bound to a tree and thrown into the raging torrent. Kane happens to be fishing near the river, rescues Stevens unseen and supports him to his cabin, where the lawyer sinks to the ground. Ruby runs to the prostrate man and tries to minister to him, calling on him the while to speak to her, but he dies in her arms and the girl is denied the only thing in the world that she wanted most—the love of an honest man.

THE LOVER'S SIGNAL.—Allan Roberts is in sad straits financially and Maurice Anderson endeavors to assist him. Grace Roberts is the idol of her father, who insists on seeing her happily married. Adjoining the Roberts' estate resides John Williams and his son, Raymond.

Robert Williams has official affairs with Anderson. Williams is wealthy and he writes his neighbor a very flattering offer for his property. Anderson, who is rich, sees a way out the difficulty by marrying Grace and restoring the fortunes of the Roberts. This meets with the approval of Roberts and the pact is made.

In the meanwhile, Raymond Williams has strolled into the grounds of Roberts and meets Grace. Raymond comes to look over the property and is immediately interested in Grace. Roberts and Anderson appear and Raymond is ordered off the premises. He does so, and they meet unobservedly.

They plan for future meetings. Raymond proposes to Grace that they agree on a signal to aid them in meeting at the trysting place. He whistles through his fingers a shrill note and she is delighted.

Raymond is entrusted to deliver some important papers out of town.

He meets Grace. He tells her of his journey and of the train on which he will leave. He has dallied too long with the girl, missing the train.

Grace is summoned before her father who is reading a newspaper and she looks over his shoulder and reads the headlines, detailing an account of a railroad wreck in which every passenger was killed. It is the train on which her lover was to leave.

She falls prostrate on the floor. Physicians are summoned. They fail to restore her and she lies in a stupor. Raymond enters the room and there finds Roberts and Anderson bending over the bedside of Grace. Raymond is obsessed by an idea. Calling the father and friend from the room, he explains his plan. Mr. Roberts consents.

Grace is left alone and Raymond, going to an adjoining room gives the whistle. As the first shrill notes echo through the room, the girl bears and she partially revives. She leaves the room expectantly and peer through the door. The experiment has failed. Raymond excitedly whistles again and the call of love has its effect. The girl rises, her reason clears and she realizes that it is her lover summoning her.

The men return to the room to find her in possession of her reasoning faculties. Raymond takes the girl in his arms. The father is overjoyed and invites his friends to join him in a hospitable glass. All objections as to their marriage being removed Raymond and Grace are happy in their unrestricted love.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A VICTIM OF HIS DOUBLE.—Two rogues are seen in their room discussing the news that a certain count has bought his wife a very valuable diamond tiara, and they form a plot to get possession of the beautiful present. The first step is to snapshot the count as he leaves the station with his wife. One of the rogues makes up as the count, and obtains admission to the house. The false count receives a visit from his confederate, and together they force the safe, the confederate departing right away with the tiara the count soon following. The real count and countess return to the house, and the theft of the tiara is discovered. The countess is terribly upset, and her husband telephones for a detective. He examines the premises, and finds the cigarette which one of the thieves has left behind. By a happy coincidence he notices some ashes near a cigarette, which is similar to the one found in the count's house. The detective follows the fellow, but the rogues are too clever. The detective is bound hand and foot, and put in a trunk to which the infernal machine actuated by a timefuse is attached. The rascals take their departure, and this is the signal for the detective's assistant, who has remained outside to go and see what has become of his master. He is just in time to extinguish the fuse, and the detective is soon set at liberty. They then find a map, and pencil marks on which seem to indicate that the thieves have gone to a certain town. The detective is too late to catch the same train, so he takes a motor car and there ensues a thrilling race between train and motor car. This is a particularly successful portion of the film: at one point the train and the motor car are running level with each other, a parallel track, the car has the advantage by a few minutes at the station, and the thieves are just and only just in time to secure their possession, and at the end we see the count hand it to his wife, whose delight is unbounded.

SOLAX.

A PACKAGE OF TROUBLE.—Mrs. Dix, out shopping, accompanies a friend to the bank and forgets a package in front of the bank clerk's window. A few minutes later her husband goes to the bank, sees a package of money by it down a minute, picks up the package left by his wife and goes home.

Mrs. Dix discovers her mistake, goes back to the bank and gets the package left by her husband containing money.

When Mr. Dix gets home he hides his package in the grate, and his daughter, Mary, to give him a lesson in the art of carefulness, takes the package, locks it in a box and puts it in the book case. A tramp enters the house and steals the package.

The tramp is captured and the package found on him, but the family of Dix's are again dashed when the box's contents proves to be a pair of stockings. While the tramp was being treated for the scratches he got the original package among Mrs. Dix's purchases, and puts it in the box, and later in an outburst of grief, Mrs. Dix overturns the box and the real valuable package is found.

SHE WAS JUST AFRAID.—Burglar robs neighbor's house. Lady returning from matinee finds room topsy turvy, and rushes to the next door neighbor and tells of it. Husband reads evening newspaper account of recent burglaries. He sends woman back to her home and leaves to inform police, but on the way he changes his mind and returns to his wife. She has often bragged to him of being absolutely fearless and he decides to put her to the test.

The husband disguises as a burglar and uses his pipe for a revolver. He gets the drop on her and compels her to wait upon him, but while he is drinking she discovers the deception, and getting a real revolver from a desk nearby turns the tables completely.

The possibilities for comedy are perfectly and plainly apparent and the intensely funny situations created will make this a laugh of unusual merit.

THE MILL OF THE GODS.—Jack Carlton and Stanley Moore, two young tellers in the Greenleaf National Bank, propose to Madaline Gaumont, who pays them a visit at the bank. She finally rejects Moore and accepts Jack.

Four years later, Madaline, who has become Jack's wife, again calls at the bank, and Moore, who has been elected president, shows his love for her and is more impatient than ever at the way things have turned out for him regarding Madeline.

Jack has in the past four years risen to the position of cashier and is busy in his cage just as his wife decides to go home. He asks Moore for permission to see his wife to the door.

When Jack has left his cage, Moore, a fit of jealous rage, steals a package of money which contains $20,000, and for which Jack has just signed a receipt from the U. S. Treasury.

Jack re-enters his cage after bidding his wife goodbye and finds to his astonishment and dismay that the package of money is missing. He asks Moore if he has seen it, whereupon Moore accuses Jack of its theft.

Moore secures from an easily bought official a warrant for Jack's arrest without the usual formalities, but before the warrant can be served, president Moore meets with a fatal auto accident, while enroute to hurry Jack's arrest.

Jack arrives home and finds a telegram from Moore to the effect that if he does not return the money in question immediately he will be put under arrest.

Jack knowing that there were no witnesses and that it is his word against the president's, realizes that it means State's Prison for a long term. Driven mad by the disgrace he determines to end it all, and is about to end his life with a pistol bullet when his wife, who has secreted herself as a burglar, to have some fun with her husbands, comes upon him just as he is pressing the gun to his head. By a supreme effort she forces the gun from his head.

Just as she gains control of the frenzied man the telephone rings. It is a message for Jack to hurry to the bedside of the dying president. He reaches the mansion just in time to hear the confession of his guilt from his own lips, and the picture closes with Jack and Madaline standing by the bedside of the dead banker making forgiveness for his sins and for God's mercy.

YANKEE.

THE SECRET OF THE OPAL MINE.—Dr. King has settled Idlers Island, where he went for the benefit of his health, accompanied by his sister Rose.

He had invested all his money in an opal mine, but through lack of sufficient funds to operate it properly, was obliged to organize a syndicate to finance the proposition.

Don Jose, a Mexican expert, was superintendent of the mine and had discovered a secret natural entrance to the mine, disclosing rich deposit of the precious stones, which he had been surreptitiously removing for some time.

Jack Dorman, the foreman of the mine, accidentally discovers the secret entrance to the mine, observed by the faithless superintendent, who, fearful that his perdiy would be discovered, plans to eliminate Dorman permanently by mine and thus hide his guilt.

The doctor has just been refused further financial aid by the syndicate and is in the depth of despair, when the young foreman arrives to report his discovery. The doctor scoffs at the report as mere youthful enthusiasm, but enters the mine to investigate Jack's statement.

Don Jose, fearful of his plans, but delaying his exit from the mine, where the doctor has surprised him, in order to lure the latter to the shaft.

The doctor is trapped in the tunning mine and when assistance arrives it is impossible to enter through the flames coming from the shaft. Jack, accompanied by the doctor's sister, heads a band of miners to the secret entrance, but they are met by a seemingly impassable wall of rock. In desperation the men apply their picks and after almost herculean efforts, break a passage into the mine proper.

Into the veritable furnace rushed the heroic little band, Jack and Rose in the van, and not a moment too soon, for the flames were already licking the timbers of the shaft.

"But it's an ill wind that blows nobody good," for after the fire had been conquered, it was discovered that the treacherous superintendent's blast had disclosed richer deposits of opals than ever he had dreamed of.

Jack was badly burned, but the doctor fixed him up nice and comfortable and with Rose to nurse him (which she insisted upon doing), Jack cannot be blamed for delaying his recovery.

From recent reports it looks as though the new superintendent would marry the doctor's sister.

THE GIRL STOWAWAY'S HEROISM.—A seafaring man in moderate circumstances has left his daughter with his widowed sister and her crippled son at their modest home in Liverpool, England, while he was to look after property left his last acquired in the Bermudas.

He is then suddenly and seriously ill aboard ship and a wireless message to this effect is sent from the S. S. Trent to his daughter. The aunt has not sufficient funds to pay for her niece's passage and the daughter therefore resolves to disguise herself as a boy, in one of her cousin's suits of clothes and steal her way aboard a schooner about to sail for Bermuda. She gets aboard the vessel and secretes herself in the fo'c'sle, where she is discovered when out at sea, by John, head lad, a villainous sailor.

The Captain orders the dogging manfully meted out to a stowaway, but the mate, a sympathetic, manly fellow, is struck by the boy's appearance and innocent manner and refuses to apply the lash. The Captain administers the Cat and in her struggle the sex of the stowaway is revealed. During the voyage the stowaway jumps overboard and saves the mate's life, which has been placed in jeopardy by the vengeful Dick Dead Eye.

During the long trip to Bermuda the mate and the girl stowaway are constant companions, so love finally wins its way and the mate lays his heart and fortune at her feet.

Arriving at Bermuda the lovers find the girl's father at the Seaman's Hospital, almost recovered and preparing to return home on the same steamer where the young couple are happily married at an early date.

REX.

AS YE SOW, SO SHALL YE REAP.—Youth is reckless, and the sin committed in a moment of folly may be repented in hours of remorse. He visits his mother on a vacation and becomes infatuated with her maid and commits the sin eternal, and goes away and the child is born. The mother, prostrate by the event, leaves the world of her sin and folly, first placing the child in an orphan home. Years speed by during which the creator of her misery and child, marries and still the years go by, a child is born to him by his lawful wife and four years later his wife sends to the orphanage in which his illegal daughter is an inmate, for a governess, and the one selected by the Mother Superior to fill the position is none other than his own. He recognizes in her the resemblance of the woman he has wronged years and later discovers through identification of a locket the girl wears, that she is his own child and embraces her. His wife coming upon the scene demands an explanation which he gives and is forgiven. Later he makes the unfortunate girl in her arms and offers her a mother's love.

LET US KNOW YOUR WANTS

As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat anymore since the

was installed.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

nd all such talk is dodging the issue—You want to make money; our proposition is a money-making one.

You have not been able to make money of late; therefore our proposition should be of vital importance o you.

You can take the most modern of steamships and almost any "Land-lubber" could put her on the rocks. The picture proposition is a parallel—You can't sail into the harbor of success on pictures alone; it akes a showman to handle the picture craft—No showman would attempt to handle pictures unless he saw the average elements of protection at hand to work with—Boiled down into the fewest possible words: ARE YOU TIRED OF YOUR LOSSES?

To the man who wants to make money, the Exclusive service proposition should appeal as has nothing n the history of the business, for it means the possibility of applying business methods to your money-making affairs. The use of those safeguards that prudence and years of commercial experience dictate, are necessary to the success of any enterprise.

Stop worrying about your competitor, and like the able captain, use your brains to handle your own craft. Exclusive service gives you the elements of protection needed for your work.

The National Film Mfg. & Leasing Company, an amalgamation of interests for the purpose of marketing the best program that brains and money can produce on a basis that will insure the Exchange and the Exhibitor a reasonable profit on his investment of money, time and brains; not a philanthropic body, but a business organization, with a business proposition for business men.

A PRETTY PASTORAL!

Velvet and Rags

is the tale of one boy's change from the former to the latter, and of another boy's change, vice versa. Neither youth was forced to the change by circumstance or condition, by fortune good or fortune bad, by financial gain or financial loss, but by plain love of adventure! And, through the transformation, they adventured to their heart's content—and more—see the odd finale on the screen.

A Story of a Double Substitution

Old Home Week

is a comedy drama of the highest motion picture type, and will further advance the good reputation American-made pictures have earned of late. It deals with a man who determined to know if good fortune alone kept him his friends. A ragged suit of clothes solved the problem. He wore them, though his coffers were filled to the bursting with money, and went to see his chums-of-youth in them. The result of the research is interestingly depicted in the reel.

Vol. 8 APRIL 8, 1911 No. 14

Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York Goes on Record in Favor of a National Convention of Exhibitors.

Daniel M. Donegan, the popular secretary and treasurer of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, was a caller at the office of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD this week to assure us of the adequate representation of that Association at a National Convention of Exhibitors. He proffered the aid of the Association in the efforts being made to get together a representative gathering and fully agreed with the suggestion made on this page last week that the time was ripe for the formation of a National Association. The right men to represent each State could, he said, be elected by popular vote at this first National Convention.

Among the many things which we discussed, showing the need for a National Convention, was the adverse measures which were apt to be slipped through the legislature of any State. One such unfair measure we cited last week; another is an attempt being made by some misinformed person to get a bill passed in Trenton prohibiting the exhibition in the State of New Jersey of any film in which crime was depicted or suggested. Expunge from the Bible, from Shakespeare, from the standard novel, from the family newspaper, all reference to crime and what would there be left? Why exists a National Board of Censorship if there is necessity for such a law, and who is to enforce and interpret the law? The Motion Picture Patents Company sent its legal talent to Trenton, we are informed, to checkmate this modern revival of the Blue Laws; but how much more potent they would be, in cases like these, if backed up by an association of 10,000 exhibitors?

Certain people, Mr. Donegan said, not satisfied with letting well enough alone, were even now taking steps to petition the legislature to repeal the Sunday law and the children's age limit statute. Better, he said, to let sleeping dogs lie. The New York exhibitor is at present enjoying a season of liberal government. There has been no need for some time and there does not exist at present any need for rebelling against reasonable laws which are being reasonably enforced. There always exists the possibility that some one will seize upon the opportunity to get notoriety, if nothing else, and bring about a worse condition than at present. This, he says, is why the Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York has apparently been inactive for some time. As a matter of fact they are simply lying down with both eyes wide open, ready to bestir themselves at any emergency. The legal adviser of the Association, Mr. Robert L. Luce, has only recently returned from Albany, where he was successful on a mission that was greatly to the advantage of the exhibitors of this territory.

Unaffiliated exhibitors throughout Greater New York do not realize to what extent they are indebted to this Association, which came into being and did yeoman service at a time when the business in this city was almost threatened with extinction. Also, it should not be forgotten that it was this self-same Association which footed the initial expenses and made possible the National Board of Censorship which has done much to silence the adverse critic. This Board is now supported by the People's Institute, a civic organization, but it owes its birth to the Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York. Exhibitors in this territory, who are not affiliated but desire to enroll, may obtain particulars from any of the following officers: Frank Paulton, President, 149th Street and Eagle Avenue, Bronx; Henry Schwarz, Vice-President, 175 West 116th Street; Daniel M. Donegan, Secretary, 2 Henderson Place, New York City.

A Screen Suggestion.

It has often occurred to us that the flat appearance of the pictures on the screen could be improved upon in some way that would add greatly to their artistic presentation, and also bring out in greater relief or boldness, the figures and scenes in the pictures. We recall one or two efforts in this direction in some theatres where they placed what appeared to be a large wooden frame around the picture. This was an improvement, but failed to give any suggestion of depth to the picture, as the frame was flat-looking itself and was placed close against the curtain.

We hear time and again of the unfavorable showing that the average moving picture theatre in New York City makes when compared with houses all over the States, and especially with some houses in the far West. As our personal experience in viewing pictures has been almost exclusively in and around New York City, the following suggestion may be an old story to most exhibitors, but it may be worth while passing along.

In the course of conversation with a friend who occasionally drops in to see us, and who is familiar with houses all through the West and in Canada, we learned of a plan adopted sometime since by a manager who evidently recognized the necessity of improving the appearance of his pictures and who had original ideas as to how it could be done. For a screen he took canvas in place of the usual muslin and treated it with one of the many preparations on the market for giving a smooth, even surface to the curtain. On account of its greater strength the canvas could be drawn more securely and evenly and was less likely to wave or bulge through air currents, and in general gave a more solid, wall-like effect. Another piece of canvas was then taken and an opening cut in it the exact size of the picture to be projected, and this was painted dead black. This was placed a slight distance in front of the screen, and gave much the same effect as a mat does to a framed picture. A frame was then constructed of glass with colored electric lights behind it, and this again was placed a short distance in front of the black canvas. We understand the effect was most satisfactory, the picture giving the appearance of being neatly framed, and the placing of the mat and frame some distance in front of the screen adding greatly to the depth of the figures and scenes on the screen.

Anything that will make the people and moving objects in the pictures appear in high relief on the screen will certainly appeal to every audience, and coupled with perfect projection, will be another step forward. Undoubtedly, to get the best possible effect, the size of the house, the length of throw, and peculiarities as to the seating arrangement of each house will have to be considered in determining the distance the frame and the mat should be placed from each other and from the screen.

In the construction of the frame, the ingenuity of the manager and the electrician can find ample scope. The glass frame might be constructed of different colored sections of glass to give a kaleidoscopic effect, or of colored glass in straight sections, to give a carved frame effect of any design, or the frame might be of plain glass and the color effects be obtained by colored electric bulbs.

As we have already said, this may be nothing new to most of our readers, but it may suggest something to others. Nothing that will improve in the slightest degree the exhibition of the moving picture is unworthy of attention of either this paper or the exhibitor or manager or operator, and, as in the making of the film, it is the attention to little details that counts, so in the theatre it is the manager and the operator who give the best attention to every detail and improvement that usually gets the best results and the best business.

Why We Have Kept Silent,

"One way to measure your success is by the earnestness with which your competitors lie about you." — Benjamin Franklin.

The "man-who-is-greater" than his job, to wit, a certain slide maker, knocker and sometimes "editor" of an advertising bulletin, continues to inject ill-mannered insinuations regarding his betters into his writings for that sheet. This reminds us that we have not yet explained to him why we have not gone after that $50 which seems to be burning a hole in his pocket, so here goes.

If such an offer had been made by a legitimate journal, such, for example, as our late contemporary, the "Nickelodeon," we would have been delighted to take up the bet; but we have nothing in common with private advertising schemes.

Let us explain. The "Film Index," a subsidized publication, which we characterized in our issue of December 10, 1910, issued a challenge, with $50 as a side bet, that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD could not disprove a statement made by one of their staff, but which, by-the-way, has since been done by others. Win or lose, the "Index expert" figured that the advertising he would get out of it would be cheap at $50; but we were not to be caught by so transparent a trick—not like the exhibitor who pays $2 for what he can get free. We mean the "Film Index," the weekly bulletin of the licensed film manufacturers, which is owned by some of them, dictated to by them, run by them and managed by a few individuals who also use it for self advertisement. Outside of the film manufacturers' advertisements and the usual dope of the press agent, what does it contain? A page by J. H. Hallberg (to advertise J. H. Hallberg); a page, more or less, by Arthur D. Jacobs (to advertise the Exhibitors' Advertising and Specialty Co., Arthur D. Jacobs, president); a page, more or less, to advertise James L. Hoff's slides of celebrities (licensed only of course). Clearly one-sided, but with a well defined mission like any other house organ and could be tolerated but for the fact that the "man-who-is-greater" than his job sometimes kicks over the traces and imagines that he is running a real trade paper.

Now the reader will understand why we ignored the impudent challenge of the "Index," especially those of our readers who have been flim-flammed out of two dollars to pay for mailing to them every week this "trust" advertising bulletin. True, the wise exhibitor forgets to send his $2 and he gets the "Index" just the same, but we know from our correspondence that quite a few have been buncoed. How could the "man-who-is-greater" than his job expect us to cover his $50 when he is known as such an expert at the con game?

So that James L., in his blatant bulletin, may not come back with a dig below the belt because we referred above to his employers as a "trust," we will prove to him that he is responsible for conferring that distinction. If any reader of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD can procure a copy of the "Film Index" of February 25, 1911, he will find on page 3, first column, the following editorial sentence:

> "Manager McLendon will run nothing but trust pictures, such as the Biograph, Vitagraph, Selig, Lubin, Pathe Freres and others."

Edison, Kleine, Melies and Kalem are not mentioned; but perhaps these concerns prefer being left out in the cold rather than being dubbed as a "trust" by the managing editor of their own paper. James, how could you? And only a few weeks previous you printed the heading in 24-pt. type, "Pathe Freres Not in a Trust," over a decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio!

If we are to believe our ears, the hold-up game at No. 1 Madison Avenue is not confined to extracting $2 from the exhibitor to pay for the postage and printing of private advertising matter. Rumor asserts that the manufacturer of specialties has it whispered in his ear that certain orders will come his way in proportion to his advertising in the subsidized sheet. We have investigated and can say that there is absolutely no reason for the making of these vague promises other than to pull the wool over the eyes of the victim while the shell game goes merrily on.

We again ask the kind indulgence of our readers for digressing from our usual staid course. Several people have asked us why we do not reply to the yelping of the house organs, and we trust that we have now answered their queries in a satisfactory way.

The Junk Exchange.

Last week we devoted an article to the necessity of reforming the exchange end of the moving picture business. This question has agitated many minds ever since the time, now over two years ago, when the Patents Company entered the field with a very new broom indeed. It is only in recent times that the establishment of the General Film Company and the passing of many exchanges under its control, have demonstrated the thoroughness and the necessity of the policy dictated from No. 80 Fifth Avenue, New York. The Patents Company has been the object of much animadversion and criticism, but it cannot be denied that its methods make for good business results and that its influence has been to the advantage of the industry as a whole.

The Sales Company, it is known, has made something of an attempt to line up the exchanges under its control, and, it must be conceded, with, at present, some success. Perhaps the business methods of some independent exchanges still leave something to be achieved, but on the whole, solid progress has been achieved in this direction.

Chiefest of all remaining dangers to the exchange end of the business is, we are convinced, the Junk Exchange—the dealer in cold, very cold, copies, indeed. From inquiries we have made there are, it seems, throughout this country, several hundreds of junk exchanges on the independent side. On the licensed side the existence of the junk exchange is an impracticability, because the life of a licensed film is limited by effluxion of time.

Not so on the independent side. The life of an independent film is not limited by agreement, compulsory or voluntary. The consequence is that the average independent film is foredoomed to junkdom. It meanders "down the groove of time," becoming worse and worse in quality in the hands of dealers whose business in life it is to lend out the film to exhibitors of an inferior kind, who can afford little or nothing for service. Thus it does harm in a double sense: it prevents the renting of early-run films, and disgusts the public who witness it in appallingly bad condition. The junk exchange man both degrades and depresses the independent business.

When you buy a second-hand book, picture, or any other article, you take it for what it is, an intrinsically good article, slightly the worse for wear. Second-hand business is not harmful to the original business itself. But the junk film sheds some of its qualitative value the oftener it is handled; it becomes irretrievably, uselessly bad. Yet it enjoys all the publicity of a flawless film, reacting of course unfavorably upon the latter, as people who look at junk films unconsciously associate the bad qualities of all films with the junk article.

The limitation of the lives of all films issued to exchanges independent as well as licensed, would appear the obvious solution of the problem.

Separate Producers for Drama and Comedy.

Perhaps there is no other individual in the world who is expected to know so many things as the photoplay producer. Now-a-days a moving picture producer is looked to for scenarios of his own composition as well as to revise those of others and adapt them to his own uses. Besides this he is supposed to be reading the world's best books from cover to cover with a view to reproducing them as picture plays in the near future. These things he is supposed to do in his leisure hours, and are not looked upon as part of his regular work. In addition to these small matters the manufacturers expect him to have more or less to do with the scenic arrangements.

These duties are only incidental to his work as a photoplay producer. His work proper consists of rehearsing the actors and directing them through the different scenes. When a manufacturer advertises for a director he expects to get a man who is thoroughly grounded in many branches of dramatic art, any of which might well call for a specialist in any of the particular lines. To begin with: A producer is expected to turn out equally good results in either dramatic, comic, historical, biblical, industrial and other subjects. He is also pre-supposed to have an accurate knowledge of costumes of all periods, from modern times back to the pre-historic ages. Then, again, he is expected to be an authority on the architecture of all times and climes. On top of all these he must know everything about the art of make-up. He must have an artistic eye that can comprehend the whole thing as a work of art, and last, but not least, he is supposed to know just what the public wants, and if he does not please the public, he is sure to hear from it very soon.

Under these conditions there does not appear to be much chance for a specialist to get his living out of moving pictures. The fact remains, however, that nearly every one of the branches of dramatic art mentioned above, can be properly classed as a specialty. This distinction is more clearly marked between the production of comedy and drama than in any other one of them. A man to produce funny pictures must be funny himself, or at least he must have a "funny bone" concealed about his person. It usually follows that a man who can always see the humorous side of things is one who is not prone to take things seriously, or to view the world as a very serious matter, like some do. One might as well expect a comic artist on a daily newspaper to do the serious work as well. Perhaps there are some of them who could do the serious work, but comic illustration is their specialty, and no one on the paper expects them to do anything else. The serious work is turned over to serious men, who in all probability would fall down very hard if they had to draw funny pictures every day.

Not so in the moving picture business. There are many manufacturers who are blind to their conception that there are any amount of men that can be picked up who are able to do any or all of the many things that enter into the make up of a photo play. It is very difficult to get some of these gentlemen to understand that this is the age of specialization. The lawyer specializes on any one of a thousand off-shoots of the law business. The doctor will spend his lifetime specializing on a single one of the human organs. Musicians specialize. Writers specialize. Merchants specialize. Artists specialize. Printers specialize. Machinists specialize. Even thieves specialize. But the moving picture gone merrily on without thought of such a thing. The man who produces the heavy drama full of tears and sighs to-day must to-morrow turn about and hand out a roaring comedy.

It is expecting too much of the photo-play producer, but these things are true. A man cannot be expected to know all things, and it is our belief that the next move of the manufacturers should be to subdivide their producing staves, according to the quantity and kind of reels desired. Some manufacturers have solved the problem, in a measure, by the entire specialization of their businesses. There are plants that are known to turn out nothing but dramatic pictures; others make claims of being comedy houses, pure and simple. Then, again, some few are trying to specialize in religious, historical and educational pictures. This might be called going to the extreme, and it is a question whether the policy of entire specialization is the best solvent of the problem.

Recently we were observing in one of the large studios in New York four producers at work upon four different scenes at the same time. These men were all distinctly dramatic producers, and they were working upon dramatic subjects at the time. We could not help thinking as we watched them how much better it might have been had one of them been a comedy producer, and, say two of them dramatic producers, and the fourth one a man who was a specialist in historical and biblical work.

The Associated Motion Picture Patents Company.

Two weeks ago, when introducing the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company to the reader, we mentioned that the newly-formed corporation intended erecting a special plant for developing and printing for the trade. The appended illustration from the architect's design gives an excellent idea of the façade of the building. The plans were prepared by Mr. J. W. Gibson, a well-known New York architect, and, when finished, the factory will be the most completely equipped structure of its kind, especially designed for the production of perfect positives from moving picture negatives. The land on which to erect this building has already been acquired and building operations will commence at an early date.

The important position of General Superintendent and Technical Director of this plant has been tendered Mr. Thomas Bedding, F. R. P. S., Associate Editor of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. We do not know of any available man more fitted for the position. Mr. Bedding's association with the moving picture started in the year 1896, when he was Editor of the "British Journal of Photography," in London, England. Coming to this country a little over three years ago, he added to his experience by practical work in the developing rooms of the now defunct Cameraphone Company. Since February, 1909, Mr. Bedding, as our readers well know, has been one of the editors of this publication, which position he will continue to hold until actively engaged in his new duties.

THOMAS BEDDING, F. R. P. S.

In addition to the developing and printing for the trade, the Associated Company intends producing scientific educational, biblical, geographical, scenic, historical and industrial subjects. We shall watch with interest the growth of this latest factor in the moving picture business.

PROPOSED PLANT OF ASSOCIATED MOTION PICTURE PATENTS CO.

A Vital Question Answered.

By Robert Grau.

I was asked the other day what in my opinion at this time would be the greatest and most ennobling effort that could be made to raise the level of cinematography and yet be wholly within the scope and comprehension of the public to whom the modern picture theatre caters.

The question was indeed a serious one, and really would involve vast research rather than be responded to in ordinary conversation. I did not, as a fact, then express myself, but the matter has so occupied my thought ever since that I feel justified in recording here some impressions which have resulted from such observations as have been possible within a very brief period and under circumstances far from being favorable for so epochal and far-reaching a problem.

The first move in an effort to suggest, a great incentive to the producers for the film companies, is to make fair observation of what has been achieved and to note the public response, the writer discovered that two great arts have not yet been availed of to any extent comparable with the tremendous possibilities they offer. These are Pantomime and Symphonic Poems.

The fact that so artistic and classical a player as Pilar Morin has been available to the producers and that her vogue has not been constant and compelling, is evidence enough that the day has not yet come for pantomime of the quality which this superb artiste stands for, but the reason for this is an utter lack of equipment. What is needed to make pantomime a sensational vogue is a complete organization of Pilar Morins, a veritable pantomime stock company, and as an added requisite, a Composer-Pianist, who will expressly make a piano score for each production, but which in interpretation can be played by any first-class pianast, such as must soon be an absolute necessity of every progressive picture theatre.

Imagine the sensation which would be made if another work quite as good as "L'Enfant Prodigue" were to be evolved in a picture theatre of today; this delicious work of art ran a thousand nights in London and nearly as long in Paris, where Jane May, by no means the equal of Mlle. Morin, was the "Pierrott." In this country at Daly's Theatre. "L'Enfant Prodigue" had a long run at $2.00 a seat, and yet this is precisely the type of performance that I wish to suggest as the greatest possible aim of the picture theatre of tomorrow.

To present pantomimes running twenty to thirty minutes, replete with story and situation and embellished with a musical setting worthy of a great symphony orchestra, but rendered by a lone but capable pianist, is in my humble opinion the very highest goal that cinematography can reach out for.

Mme. Morin is an excellent stage directress, and if she were given carte blanche by some enterprising and public-spirited producer, and was allowed to proceed to France to select her confrères, of whom there need not be many, and to identify with the project the proper man for the pianiste end, then indeed may I say that cinematography will have been revolutionized, for it will have perpetuated a great art—that of pantomime, and it will be left to the modern picture theatre to present the many great "plays without words," but which can only be properly expressed to playgoers by conducting the bijou theatre as a veritable art institution, and then we shall see the critics of the daily press devoting as much space to the premierres at the picture theatre as they now do for the productions of Mr. Frohman or even the efforts of the New Theatre founders who are about to build an intimate little theatre to replace the architecturally wrong one now in use.

It has got to come—for the men who control our best theatres used for cinematography have not got to worry about where their audiences are to come from, as is the case with those who struggle with the regular theatre problem. Hence, nothing can stop such men—successful and ambitious—from overcoming every obstacle in an effort to raise the level of their offerings.

Film Service at Standard Prices.

By Henry.

It seems strange to the New England representative of the World that there should be so great a range of prices for film service as is the case. Why should exhibitors, using exactly the same quality and quantity of film service, pay different rental prices? Why is it that every different grade of service has not a regular price? A careful survey will show that all other branches of this business have standard prices, which are known to all. The M. P. machines with all the accessories used with them, the song slides, even the leading journal of the trade, the World, plainly advertise their prices and rates. As things are now conducted in the very great majority of exchanges throughout the entire country (both licensed and independent) every theater makes the best bargain possible. It is well known that some houses pay considerably more for their service than do others, using exactly the same grade of films. The M. P. business has reached a condition sufficiently advanced, we venture to state, to pay more attention to this end of things than has hitherto been the case. To tell the truth, this end of the trade is conducted more like a second-hand clothing store than a large industry. The exhibitor and the exchange haggle and beat each other down. When the final agreement is made, both parties are often dissatisfied. Dissatisfaction promotes unrest and unharmonious conditions—bad symptoms in any business, and especiallly so in this one. No exhibitor likes to pay more for his films than is a competitor showing the same class of service, often from the very same exchange. We know of a score of exhibitors throughout New England who have switched from licensed to independent service, and vice versa, for this very reason. The up-to-date methods of conducting any legitimate business is to plainly advertise all prices. In this way everyone has an equal chance, and knows he is on an equal footing with his neighbor. All cause for dissatisfaction, fancied or real, is eliminated. Often times exhibitors incorrectly imagine, for some reason or other, that they are paying more than their neighbors showing the same service. Even so; this does not make conditions any the better. There is one easy and sovereign cure for this dissatisfaction which seems to be quite general and that is, as was stated above, standard prices for every grade of film service, said prices to be plainly advertised and made known to exhibitors, just as are the advertising rates of this journal. All reputable business houses have standard prices—why not the M. P. business, which is eminently reputable? Let us have much more publicity on this question, and much less of this secretiveness as regards service. The matter is worthy of serious consideration by every film exchange.

THE CINES CO.

In our last issue we briefly made mention of the fact that the Cines Company's pictures were about to be introduced to the market. Some further particulars of the company seem called for. Volume of business places the Cines third or fourth in the list of the world's moving picture manufactories. At times it has a thousand people working in a picture. The advertisement on another page gives a rough idea of the extent of the company's operations. It is due the Cines, however, to say that the qualities of the picture are their best recommendations. The Cines picture has made spasmodic appearances on the American market, but it is the merest justice to say that it has never been properly presented to the public, through the exchange and the exhibitors. Perfect photography and strong characterization pictures which invariably have the finest exemptions settings.

Subjectively we learn that the Cines pictures are to be adapted to the American market, thus removing the reproach that Italian pictures are unsuitable for audiences in this country. Feature films are constantly released, and the directors of the Cines are confident that their product will win the approval of the persons.

It has always been the policy of the Moving Picture World to stand for the best that is in the picture and on those grounds we have pleasure in welcoming the Cines picture to this market.

Is "Vodeveal" Necessary?

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

CUTE

DON'T you think we have had enough of the cheapest and poorest form of entertainment ever slung over the apron of the stage into the face of a self-respecting and unoffending audience?

There is a picture theater near my house which is so airy and comfortable that I would like to go there every day. The reason I do not is because I cannot stomach more than one unsavory dish of "vodeveal" a week. The mere thought of enduring a second dose of the nauseating acts presented in that house drives me away to some more congenial place of entertainment. I do not know how much the manager of that place pays the Dutch comedian who plays wretchedly on several excruciating instruments, but if this unmusical performer's salary was added to that of the ghastly soubrette who recites a threadbare song in a cigarette voice and the total applied to raising the quality of the miniature orchestra, I would go, my friends would go, and we would send others. There is no advertisement superior to a satisfied customer. I do go once in a while, being of a hopeful disposition, but regularly I walk several blocks further down the street, even on cold nights, and deposit my contribution at a less pretentious place. So do others. There is nearly always a waiting line at the modest place. They only give four pictures there, but these pictures are well projected on a superior screen, and the girl at the piano is a Jim-Dandy.

I did not notice that girl at first, possibly because she was not rubber-necking or smiling at the hatchet-face in the front row, but I gradually became conscious that the most ordinary pictures shown seemed to have taken on a new guise, all the merit that was in them came out and was fully appreciated because that quiet little girl at the piano knew her business and attended to it instead of neglecting it to give an impression that she was superior to her job. I became interested even in one of those decadent survivals of primitive photoplays in which white men with whiskers on their legs chase red men with feathers on their heads because the music was so spirited that I found myself excusing the dime-novel drama. I looked around me and saw a nice class of people enjoying themselves, mostly men with their wives and children and I asked the man next to me if the place was always so well patronized. He told me that it was to be enlarged in a few weeks because it was impossible to accommodate all who came during busy hours of the evening.

"As far as I am concerned," he added, "I come here as much to hear that girl play as to see the pictures."

I paid more attention to the girl. She was not enough of a natural musician to improvise, but she had a large assortment of sheet music on the rack from which she made intelligent selections. She had evidently done some thinking ahead, possibly she had read a summary of the plays in advance, anyway she was on time at every change of scene with something suited to the sentiment. There was nothing particularly brilliant about her performance, but it was in good taste and satisfactory to those who came to be entertained.

DASHING SOUBRETTE

SOMETHING NEW

I went back to the more pretentious theater, and, noticing that it was only about half full, I asked the proprietor why he handed out such indigestible stuff as "vodeveal."

"I don't like it," he said, "but the people want it and I have to give it to 'em."

That is what he thinks. It is quite possible that a number of people are really drawn into his place by the variety entertainment, but I doubt if they equal the number driven away by it. Those driven away are the most desirable patrons; they are the steadies who have acquired the habit; in this case they have acquired the habit of going elsewhere.

"Vodeveal" had nothing to do with bringing these theaters into existence; to the contrary it put many of them on the ritz. Most of these theaters were impossible before the advent of moving pictures and they would be just as impossible now if the pictures were withdrawn, yet every conceivable slight is put upon that essential portion of the entertainment which brought most of these theaters into existence and is keeping them alive today. Of course intelligent managers do not slight any portion of the business, but a good many of them do not realize how annoying it is to sensible people in the audience when the jackass at the drum keeps up a running fire of conversation with the pianist or the latter lapses in his performance to play with one hand or practise an accompaniment for some forthcoming song. These things may seem trivial to the jackasses in the orchestra, but they distract attention from the pictures in a way that is irritating to a large percentage of the patrons, especially to those in the front row. On the stage, behind the screen, those who are about to come on with an unmusical act, tune their instruments while there's a picture play in progress and all along the line there are evidences of hositility shown to the picture production wherever it is given in combination with "vodeveal." Whether this hositility is due to ignorance or prejudice makes very little difference; it so seriously injures the photoplay presentation that theaters devoted to pictures alone in combination with superior instrumental music as an harmonious accessory are drawing the biggest crowds.

Given a well-ventilated theater with comfortable seats and polite attendants the best possible plan to fill it is to present new pictures with fine projection to appropriate music. Thousands are able to go every day to such exhibitions where hundreds would patronize cheap "vodeveal" once a week. The man who first presents a high-class picture on up-to-date principles will find money falling into the box office drawer like the food which sustained the children of Israel in the wilderness.

NEW CAMERAGRAPHS FOR K. & P.'s UNION SQUARE.

In conjunction with the Rothafel daylight picture screen, there have been installed in Keith & Proctor's Union Square Theater, New York City, two of the latest Powers No. 6 cameragraphs, which will in all probability perform their part in the daylight projection idea to the fullest expectations.

POWER'S PLANT THREATENED.

On Saturday night, March 18th, the Nicholas Power plant had a very narrow escape from destruction by fire. Only the fact that the building is thoroughly fireproof is what saved it. The only damage that was done was the destruction of quite a number of heavy belts, which cut off the power for just one day delaying operations to that extent Hudson Electric Supply Co. Enters the Moving Picture Field.

It is a pleasure to record the fact at this late day that there is one electrical supply house that has announced its intention of catering especially to the moving picture trade. The electrical requirements of a photoplay theater are so many and varied that it was only a question of time before some live electrical concern would recognize the field and cater to the cinematograph trade as a specialty. We refer to the Hudson Eletrical Supply Company, of 49 Hudson Street, New York City, as the enterprising and progressive firm that has been wise enough to see the field before them and it is the opinion of this paper that there is a decided field for such an establishment and it is not possible for us to see where their venture is other than wise.

It is the intention of the Hudson Electrical Supply Company to carry every electrical requirement of a motion picture theater in stock; catering to moving picture houses will be their principal business. Besides the electrical equipment which they will carry they intend also to market some specialties which are not necessarily electrical, but which may be properly included in that sphere, and which so far have not been obtainable at supply houses doing a general electrical business. All these things will be carried in stock to be had at a moment's notice. Items such as carbons, both for moving picture and flaming arcs, condensers, wire and cables of all kinds, rewinders, lugs, tickets, film cement, rheostat, all kinds of electrical bulbs and shades, cords, tape, cutouts, etc. etc. These items, of course, are to be had of any motion picture supply house, or electrical store, but the Hudson people are going in for specialty work of various kinds. For instance: They have already perfected a new type of exit light, which is New York approved and made after a certain pattern of their own which, purchased in half-dozen lots, will give a uniformity of exit lights throughout the theater. Another of their specialties is the Colonial oscillating fan for A.C. and D.C. This fan can be set for four degrees of oscillation, which means that the sweep of the fan may be wide or narrow according to requirements.

One of their best specialties is the Hudson approved switch and switch cover, both of which are now being used by the Nicholas Power Company, the Edison Kinetograph Company and the American Moving Picture Machine Company. These switch covers are made from their own exclusive dies which are a very expensive set, but do their work in a very clean manner, so that there are no rough or sharp edges to injure the hand of the operator.

As a novelty they are putting out an electricians' pocket tool kit which contains all the tools needed by an operator in his work. Another of fast sellers is the baby spotlight, for use in small theaters, or where a large spotlight is not necessary. They make also a piano lamp which is an improvement on any of the piano lamps that has been seen heretofore. Its particular feature is the absence of any possibility of scratching a piano. A very useful article of their manufacture is their two-piece attachment plugs, which is an ordinary socket plug which may be tapped on the side for an extension lamp or for attaching a vacuum cleaner to any of the slide lights. Managers will find this novelty a very valuable thing to have around their theaters. They sell another much needed article which is a lamp coloring fluid. A simple method for coloring incandescent bulbs in any shade that may be desired.

There are many more novelties that this enterprising concern intends getting out in the near future, amongst which will be a protected floor light for use in lighting aisles close to the floor, and also, a protected side light which will diffuse the light perfectly and distribute it well through the lower part of the auditorium without interfering with the rays of the picture light or getting into the eyes of the audience. The Moving Picture World is pleased to note the entry into the moving picture field of an electrical house that caters directly to the moving picture trade. Such a thing has never been known before and we welcome it first because it is a convenience that moving picture men have long felt the need of, and secondly, because it is an indication that the moving picture industry is growing all the time. On another page we print the advertisement of the Hudson Electrical Company, and we would advise our readers to get in touch with this deserving concern, because we know that their intentions are to serve the trade faithfully and honestly.

Terre Haute, Ind.: The Crescent is the newest moving picture theater to be opened in Terre Haute. It seats 380 people and is said to be the largest and best equipped picture house in the city. Mr. Jesse S. Roberts is the manager.

To the uninitiated, the manufacturer, the film exchange and the moving picture exhibitor are combined as soulless individuals and corporations to wring the nickels and dimes from the innocent amusement public. It takes the man on the inside to see the fallacy of this idea. The man who runs the film exchange, as a rule, thinks the manufacturer is constantly striving to squeeze him and the exhibitor thinks the exchange man sits up all night to figure how he can put the kibosh over on the man who hires the pictures.

I have heard many complaints recently that exchange managers are inclined to be arbitrary and tell the exhibitor to take what is offered him, or go elsewhere. Of course, my informants said nothing about some exhibitors who tell the exchange man that if they do not get just what they want when they want it they will go to some other exchange. I simply mention this to show that the sublime harmony and understanding which the uninitiated think prevails does not prevail.

* * *

The moving picture business differs in no sense from any other. Go into a drug store and ask for a certain medicine—patent medicine, I refer to—and in nine cases out of ten the proprietor will tell you he has just sold the last bottle or box of what you want and recommends something "just as good," and something that will give him a larger margin of profit. The grocer, haberdasher and scores of others do the same thing, but the world still moves and no riots near the horizon. But let the poor exchange man tell the exhibitor that a particular subject has been booked by another party, but he can give something just as good, and then stop, look and listen!

There is one thing that should be looked into. I cannot say whether the exhibitor or the exchange man is to blame, but I have a double theory and will in time state both sides of it. Why is it some exhibitors run films of one make bearing titles of another? This has become quite common. My explanation is, first, that the exchange does not properly go over reels when they come in from exhibitors; secondly, exhibitors find in many instances their customers prefer a certain make of films and tack on to subjects, regardless of make, the titles made by the favorite manufacturer. I say, again, the matter should be given attention by those most interested. If it is the fault of the exchange some means should be devised to require exchanges to properly overhaul reels returned before they are sent out again. If it is the fault of the exhibitor he should be squelched. I think a question of infringement on trade-mark enters in this. To my mind the matter is one of very serious thought on the part of manufacturers. It seems hardly fair that a film made by the Uncrecelled Company should bear a title of the Inferior Company. Aside from this it is ridiculous to assume that the annexation of a title will deceive the public, especially when the pictures following display the trade-mark of the real manufacturer.

I have before me a letter from a young lady who complains that she cannot secure a position with moving picture companies. She adds that she deems the barrier against non-professionals as unjust as it deprives many young women of talent and fine appearance of an opportunity to make good. It is true that some very excellent talent may fail of appreciation, but most of the picture makers have long since carefully weighed the consequences of this disadvantage. Few ambitious people fail to realize that other people do not see them as they see themselves. The advanced makers take no chances on kindergarten forces. Experience has taught them that professionals are the most reliable, although they do come a little higher than others. The majority of the amateurs dwell upon their looks and shape. Professional actresses rank their qualifications as secondary. The manipulation of the face and form to meet requirements is but a simple matter. Ability to play parts is the chief requisite. A producer of pictures with a bunch of amateurs will consume hours in impressing upon the staff what he desires to get upon the film, while a neighboring producer with people of merit and experience will turn out a complete film in the same length of time.

I am inclined to believe that few of the amateur applicants are really serious. I know that most of them are sent to studios by designing piano players, ushers or hangers-on of picture houses. I have been in places when girls who should be in school have applied "for a job." When asked if they had experience they would reply: "I haven't been on the stage, but Mr. Moneygetter, of the Half Dime Startler in Harlem, shows your pictures and he sent me to you. He says I would be great in pictures."

But what's the use? It is only repeated history. Ever since the inauguration of theatricals the world has had a full quota of stage-struck youths and damsels. Since the introduction of moving pictures these seekers of fame have been cherishing the thought that the pictures afforded a more easy introduction to the stage than straight productions and in consequence they have multiplied more noticeably than before the advent of the pictures. In this they are very much mistaken. The scenes reflected on the screen do not reflect everything. The idea that it is much more easy to go through a speechless part than to enact a speaking character is a delusion; some of the best actors on the speaking stage would make a sorry figure in a moving picture and I know of many people who have achieved great success in photo-plays who would be out of their style when they played speaking parts. The moving picture actor, or actress, is a peculiar combination and the amateur who acquires a diploma is a unit of a small minority. Some have secured an opening and made good. I say some, but mighty few, and time is too precious to be wasted in trying to pick out the good ones. Too many people seem to think that the making of a moving picture is but a few degrees in advance of the work done in ordinary photograph galleries. They seem incapable of grasping the real situation; when a moving picture is thrown upon a screen it represents a play to all intents and purposes equal to regular productions having the speaking parts. There is no "fifty style two for a quarter" about it. You have before you the stage set like any other; scenic artists and stage carpenters have contributed their skill, the costumer has had a hand, and the people playing the characters have had their rehearsals before the final pose. The moving picture studio is not a playground. It is a theater. If anyone doubts this let a visit be paid to some studio that is on the job; see the stage hands at work, watch that director and actor. I have heard some of them rival a boss canvasman at a circus. "Oh! I should so much like to be one of those moving picture actors!" I heard a young miss say to her mate in a vaudeville. "They must have real good times. It is just like playing show at home." Yes, perhaps. But let the player spend a few feet of negatives. Whew! I can hear the director shout, "the cashier would like to see you."

A correspondent asks my opinion regarding the stability of the motion picture business. He says many people tell him it is on the decline and will soon die out as an amusement factor. I have been connected with the business for several years and stories of that kind have been about during that time. I wish to say with all possible emphasis that the business is as far from the declining point as it possibly can be. There is nothing in the future line about the moving pictures. Put all your good money down on that nag. The business is not becoming a trust—no such luck for us—it is none the less extensive. It has reached a settled stage and is now a fixture in the amusement world. We have no houses closing now; they are few compared with the opening of new places. There are many cases of capital going into the business to-day that never entered it at any other period in the past. The picture houses have become a permanent catering to amusement. Theaters there are regarded as a tempting investment. Instead of converting abandoned one-minute theaters people are now investing thousands in the construction of large, attractive, comfortable houses. Confidence in the future of the picture and every attempt than it is to-day, nor has more money backed up that confidence at any other period. I refer to the exhibition end of the business—the box office end—some exhibitors will surely disagree with me on this point. I know some of them. They have been in the business some time and not a week passes that they do not, according to their statements, lose money—but they are still in the business. That is a peculiar trait among moving picture exhibitors. When I ask an exhibitor how he is getting along and he says "good," I pinch myself to see if I am awake. I know one man who opened a place about four years ago. He had no opposition. I frequently asked him how he was getting along and, with the enthusiasm of a man about to face some great disaster, he would say: "Oh, fairly well. I wish I could sell out." The same man has now five or six competitors and is still doing business at the old stand.

The Moving Picture Theater.

By F. C. Koenig, Architect.

The name "Moving Picture Parlor" is by no means a misnomer. There is something in that name which suggests a desire at a striving for something better. When the expression first became current, the exhibitor applied the description of "Moving Picture Parlor" to his little theater in preference of using the humble phrase "Moving Picture Store." To be more explicit, he had the idea of decoration in his mind. In a vague sort of way he considered his picture house as something better than an ordinary store, or, at least, he wanted it to be, and all the time he had the idea of decoration in his mind without knowing it. Decoration means to a theater, exactly what the carvings mean to a handsome circus wagon. They are there to please the eye.

One way of looking at the amusement business is to consider it a business that caters to the five senses, and a manager, properly speaking, should consider himself as doing nothing more than catering to the delights of the five senses. To go into it deeper, let us take the sense of hearing. For that sense the manager provides singing and music. Second, the sense of smell. By his proper attention to the ventilation of his house, as well as by the use of incense, perfume or disinfectants, the manager is unwittingly catering to the patron's sense of smell. Taking next the sense of feeling: The manager endeavors to provide comfortable chairs for his audience, and the more at rest he can make them feel, the more he is sure he will please them. Then, we have the sense of taste, which is the least of all, perhaps that the amusement manager caters to, and still many theaters have candy stands. But that does not count for much. However, it is a very common sight to see the aisle boy carrying about the theater a tray of drinking water, which is furnished free of charge to the patrons who are thirsty. In this way the manager is unconsciously catering to the sense of taste. And last of all, we come to the sense of sight: For this sense the manager is lavish in his provision. He first attracts the eye with his outside illumination. He prepares a greeting for the eye in his lobby, and within his theater he endeavors also to appeal to the eye with the taste or lavishness of the interior decorations. This fact is so well known that no manager would dispute it. But few of them have ever looked at the matter as a business that caters to the five senses, which, in point of fact, is exactly what they are doing, or ought to be doing, as long as they conduct a theater.

The matter of moving picture theater decoration has been groping in the dark, which groping is finally reaching the light. In the earlier days of moving pictures, when they were mostly given in stores with the bare four walls and soiled ceiling, there was usually some attempt at pleasing the eye. In a measure it took the form of strips of bunting festooned around the walls, with here and there an ornamental patriotic motto in the shape of a printed shield, and other such tawdry affairs. Very soon after this came the arched store front, which, on account of its woeful lack of architectural principle, was very properly dubbed the "Coney Island front," and which served its purposes nicely for the time being. After that managers began to pay some little attention to harmony of color in the interior arrangement, but few of them got very far along that line, until they called in the practised decorator, or in some cases, the experienced architect. Many of the old moving picture shows were like Longfellow's "Chambered Nautilus," in that splendid poem which tells how the Nautilus, a large sea snail, annually outgrows its small shell into a larger section which becomes more beautiful each year. These small shows began to outgrow their old shells like the "chambered Nautilus," and built for themselves "more splendid mansions." And so by this gradual process of evolution the moving picture theater finally emerged from crudeness to the height of architectural beauty.

The public must be given credit for a certain influence in the betterment of moving picture theaters. In the beginning store shows were, beyond question, rather repulsive and thousands stayed away from these so-called store shows, because of their uninviting appearance. In short, they were ashamed to be seen going into them. In some vague way, the moving picture manager realized all this and endeavored to offset that tendency by naming his place a "picture parlor" and draping it with the bunting and flags, as I have said before. This, of course, was an improvement, but as the pictures were destined from the start to be a permanent thing, there was no stopping with flags and bunting. The manager began to see that the business was permanent, and therefore it should have a permanent home. All this time he was saving his money in the hope of some day, like the "Chambered Nautilus," outgrowing the old shell and dwelling in a new one more beautiful than the old.

Amateur decoration continued in this way for some few years until enough capital was amassed out of the business to bring the decorative and constructive work into the scope of professional architecture. How great has been the improvement since the entry of the architect into the moving picture field, it is not necessary to describe. The reader will concede that the architect has played his part for the everlasting good of the business. You have all seen many reproductions, in these pages and others, of handsome moving picture theaters that vie with the finest of structures of any other kind. Architects in nearly all of our cities have tried their hands at one or more moving picture theaters, but the local field is ended when the necessary theaters in a community are established, and it would not pay for a small-town architect to specialize in moving picture construction work. It has come to be a survival of the fittest, even in that branch, and in my own case, I think I may point with pardonable pride to the long list of modern picture theaters, which have come into being under my direction in the few years that I have been devoting my entire attention to that class of work.

The public is taking the picture seriously; also the press, clergy and schools. They demand only the best pictures, which must be presented in the very best way, amid surroundings that are agreeable to those who behold them. When the neighboring families have relatives or other visitors to entertain they like to take them into a theater of which they are not ashamed. The head of a family would rather trust to a theater that would not send his loved ones home cooked. A youth in many instances would not hesitate to be seen taking his young lady into a theater of some elegance or one that would not lay him open to ridicule by being considered a "cheap sport." Proper lavatories for ladies and gentlemen have only recently been considered a necessity for the comfort of patrons, likewise the proper heating, ventilation and lighting. The mechanical department, or operator's room, has always been a make-shift and seldom constructed on a par with laboratories of similar kinds in other branches of electrical work. Since the addition of vaudeville to the moving picture more knowledge than ever is required in constructing a practical stage. Labor-saving devices and structural improvements are a necessity where once they were unthought of. And thus the business has grown until it has gone out of the hands of the amateur builder in the hands of the man who knows how. Now-a-days the moving picture theater calls for every comfort for the patron and the widest knowledge in the installation of up-to-date appurtenances.

Not the least of the latest improvements in theater building are the precautions against fire; both as to the non-inflammability of material and in the proper exits for a house full of people. These things were scarcely thought of in the beginning and it is only by the rarest good fortune that there has never been a real calamity by fire. The day of the "bungaloo" is past and gone. No longer will the public tolerate the makeshift. They demand the best and this demand for the best has resulted in the call for the experienced theatrical architect whose work is so ramifying that it requires an expert in the knowledge of all that is needed in the building of a first-class moving picture theater.

Good Projection.

By F. H. Richardson.

A correspondent in Chicago, in addressing me as editor of the Trouble Department, asks: "Won't you please tell us, Mr. Richardson, in detail just what you consider good projection. In other words, what kind of work would have your undivided commendation were you to visit a motion picture show, without the operator knowing you were present, and watch the projection performance from beginning to end?"

This is a somewhat difficult matter to set forth fully and intelligently on paper. However, as the question is an altogether fair one, to which I may the World readers as answers.

As a reason of the fact that I have for the past three years laid stress on failure of operators to produce good projection, I will endeavor to make the matter as clear as possible.

In the first place, the auditorium lights must be shaded in such manner as to have no direct, and as few as possible reflected light rays, either sun or lamplight, strike the screen. In the second place, the reflected or direct rays of auditorium light reaching the curtain must be of the same intensity all over its surface. High class projection is an utter impossibility where the above two conditions are not carefully and fully complied with, particularly the latter.

The screen must be of such nature as to render pure whites as pure white (not yellow) and must be surrounded, if surrounded at all, by a dead-coloring border. The effect will be very much better if the whole front of the house is quite dark—the wall, I mean. The machine must be of the three-wing, non-flickering variety, since the flicker is not only bad but also out of date. Objection may be made to this that three-wing shutters get into synchronism with one side of the alternations with sixty-cycle current, thus producing an exceedingly objectionable "flashing" of the light. This, I reply, is not true where films are run at proper speed, save in very rare and exceptional cases, since to reach the synchronizing speed approximately eighty feet of film must pass the aperture per minute. Very, very few scenes require such speed for their best interpretation.

And thus we arrive immediately at the act of projection and the more nearly the various points already named have been found perfect, the more nearly may the operator approach perfection in the production of results yet to be described.

In the act or projection itself there are two things of vital importance but, though the number be small, a multitude of detail is involved in the two main items. Also the perfection of the two main points calls for much knowledge, eternal vigilance and close attention on the part of the operator. These two items are, perfect illumination and speed. Told in few words, but set forth in very few of the theatres, more or less, motion picture theaters of this country.

Perfect illumination means that the light shall be sufficiently brilliant to bring out the highlights in clear white; display on the screen all details of the denser scenes or every film; display the picture in all times sharply defined and with every portion of the screen even equally lighted at all times, with never even the suspicion of a shadow, save for the shadows due to the photography of the film scene or other cause inherent in the film itself. Aside from carbon fault there is and can be absolutely no valid excuse for a shadow on the screen at any time, provided the manager of the house has not refused needed replacements to the operator.

The matter of speed is of very large importance, as I have from time to time pointed out. It is in this respect the operator has it within his power to "render" a scene to a great extent, even as the musician renders the music of the composer. The operator who reaches the highest perfection in projection distinctly understands that he is able to turn the most solemn scene into a farce or a touching scene of great beauty, merely by careful graduation of projection speed. How many times has the beautiful, impressive Pathe "Passion Play" been turned into a howling farce comedy and ridiculous performance, merely by excessive speed? Imagine the Saviour skipping across the screen like a schoolboy, or the participants in the Crucifixion scene moving about like animated jumping jacks!

Again, imagine a horse race with the horses moving with about the animation and speed of a rocker rocking horse! due, of course, to lack of proper projection speed. How many, many times have you watched a supposedly rushing horse move across the stage as though floating in air? How many times have you observed a man walking with the same effect—all due to undue speed of the projection. And so I might go on for pages describing the consequences of bad judgment, or lack of any judgment at all, in the matter of projection speed. I have however, said enough, I believe, to convey my views of the many points of good projection.

To the plea for excellence of projection many managers and owners, as well as quite a few operators, reply by saying: "Projection is good enough now! The public is already getting too much for the money."

This is a narrow-minded view to take, for it is essentially true in so far as the best phases be concerned. The public is getting no more than its money from the M.P.T.M.A. Exchanges. WHO IS TO BLAME FOR IT? Who was it caused the public to expect long, fine, and costly reels, arranged every day, for low or no cost? Answer me that! Mr. Exhibitor, you are not to be sure. A guilty conscience needs no accuser, it is said! In your insane endeavor to build your business in best a competitive way instead of increasing quality, increased quantity, and you now see reaping the results of the seed you sowed.

Yes, the public is receiving too much for its money in quantity, twice over, but in quality it isn't receiving half enough. But all that is beside the real question, which is that the public isn't paying enough money. That is the real meat of the whole matter. You are starting easily at the low and too cheap end. You have yet to discover the fact that there is a twenty-five and even a fifty cent business awaiting the man who will gorgeously stage and properly project the magnificent silent drama and comedy now available. The moving picture auditorium is amazingly crude. An astounding lack of interest is displayed in the matter of studying the problems presented in the matter of staging the picture if one not alluding to the making of the film now, nor to the addition of the theater. In the opinion of the writer a broad and very profitable field awaits the one who will cater to high-class trade at, say, 10, 15 and 25 cents with one spotlight song and one illustrated song, by a real singer; one travel, or scientific or educational film with lecture, and about four other reels of late subjects. "It can't be done." Is the doubting Thomas exclaim, and simply reply: "It will be."

Crane Tells How Films Are Made.

Thanhouser Man First Independent Player to Talk to Picture Theater-Goers.

Frank Crane, a leading man of the Thanhouser company, made his appearance at the Crown Theater 116th Street and Lenox Avenue, New York City, last week and delivered a short talk on the making of moving pictures. He told several laughable stories of various mishaps that occurred during the taking of the pictures and made interesting facts about the inner workings of a moving picture studio. It is planned to have him appear at a number of independent houses in and around New York.

Mr. Crane's appearance at the Crown makes him the pioneer independent player to talk before a picture house audience. The Thanhouser reel "Not Guilty," supporting Crane as an unfortunate who has got on the wrong side of the law, was projected just prior to his entrance. It was in itself a peep at the dangers the picture player encounters, churning the speaker at the evening sliding down fast down a washline to slurry in a scene that couldn't have been better.

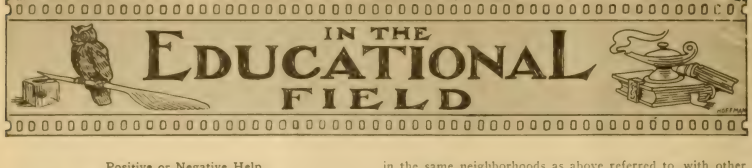
Crane was well greeted on taking the stage when "Not Guilty" flashed into its finish, and his first words were brief and simple enough to be grasped by all his auditors from the young boys up. At the conclusion of the talk Mr. Crane held an impromptu reception off the stage, with Manager Schwartz doing the introducing.

THE LOBBY-DECORATOR STILL IN DEMAND

The Thanhouser offices report that their Lobby-Decorator continues in wide demand, requests from some of the most prominent houses in the country being received. It is easily seen that many exhibitors would have received had it been easy for all independents that the Lobby-Decorator at times solely for the asking. Report is that it is a proposition with a nice busy continued future, as the following note to the Thanhouser Company will show:

Please send us your Thanhouser Outfit and all the bulletins you have about your theatre. After seeing it we will endeavor to use it.

The Thanhouser people wish to reiterate that the Thanhouser is merely a handsome half-tone sheet that may commend the poster display to the public in anyone who can show reasonable cause with the Thanhouser.



Positive or Negative Help.

In the official report of the commissioner appointed to look into moving picture affairs in New York City, it is pleasing to notice that of the pictures themselves he has no adverse criticism, some of the buildings alone coming under his strictures, as needing proper official attention. In commenting on the pictures the commissioner says, "the board of censorship is responsible for the good tone of the pictures of today."

There is no doubt much truth in this statement, and there is no need to detract in the least from any good work the board of censorship may have accomplished. It is, however, worth while remembering that all censorship help is negative. To say no, and don't, may prohibit much harm; to criticize may suggest a change, which may also be wisely made for the better. It is an accepted truth in the training of children, both in home and school, that criticism, the rebuking no, and the admonishing don't, being always negative are ultimately injurious to their future good.

Good training must be positive, as well as negative; with the former predominating. It is an error to rebuke the wrong without instructing and instilling the right. That the moving pictures are as the New York commissioner finds them today is, it must be claimed, because of positive rather than negative help. The pages of this paper and the purpose of these immediate columns have been devoted to the upbuilding and educational advance of the moving picture along the lines of positive help.

It would be a great wrong to overlook the value of the trade paper, with its special departments devoted to the best and highest interests of the moving picture world, when considering those causes which have most helped in bringing the moving picture to its present standing. There can be no doubt that the Moving Picture World, with its army of readers in every grade from manufacturer to operator, has during the last few years done more a thousand times to bring about present conditions than censorship could have accomplished in a lifetime. If help can be measured on a percentage basis, it would be proper to say that the help of these columns has been seventy-five per cent. positive, and twenty-five per cent. negative; while censorship may have been perhaps nearly a hundred per cent. negative.

This is not written with a view to detract from legitimate censorship, or to unduly exhalt this paper. It is written for the purpose of showing the greater value of positive help, and also to point out that when the standard of merit is awarded, the trade paper should be accorded its proper place in showing how those standards have been sought for and attained. It could not be suspected that a city official should be thus posted, he is only speaking of things as he finds them; but it is our duty to point them out, and to congratulate all those who have helped in the good work. To commend the board of censors alone is an error, equivalent to that of praising the judges of a contest, rather than the contestants and their coachers.

The continuance of this accepted scientific method of positive rather than negative help will be continued with the purpose of ever higher and better results.

Reading.

An observer has said that in a large majority of instances you can tell either the character of people or the localities in which they reside, by the newspaper they read in public.

Observer further says, that standing at the entrance of Brooklyn Bridge he can tell, without looking at the names of the cars, in what direction those cars are going, by the class of newspapers being read. His deductions are as follows: "Yellow" papers go everywhere, where there is that which is classed in the lowest social scale; the "mixed" papers go among the large middle class, and the literal "news" papers go among the aristocracy.

The moving picture places (not the pictures themselves) have been similarly classed. The pictures nearest the "yellow tint" with "yellow" surroundings added, are to be found in the same neighborhoods as above referred to, with other classes and conditions in corresponding ratio. The editor of a New York "yellow" when asked by a company of scholarly men "Why do you publish such filth?" replied: "We try to give the people what they want." This answer was both an insult to the people who read his papers, besides revealing him as a sycophant, instead of the scholar and teacher he as an editor is supposed to be.

To give the people "what they want" is pandering to the lowest level; if anyone doubts this statement let him try it in his home with his children, and watch the results. To give the people what they ought to have is the art of the scholar and teacher in every sphere of useful life, and nowhere more so than in the editorial page, which moulds the thought of its readers. As in paper, so in picture, also in environment of the picture; give the people what they ought to have, if it is necessary to lift them up, let it be so. The result of the accumulated knowledge of the ages must be applied for the benefit of the masses, whether they will or not; the results are everywhere justifying themselves. If people only had "what they wanted" all educational tendencies would be stifled at birth, the majority of children would not go to school if they were free in their choice; adults are grownup children, and absolute freedom of choice and action would soon have very degenerating effects upon the human race. That which is given to people to read, whether in type or picture, must be such as they ought to have; this is educational, ennobling and enriching, both in thought and action.

The majority of people, every day, do as they ought to do, and not as they want to do; we are governed by principles and not by whims and fancies. If this truth is absorbed by all whose province it is in any way to act as leaders of human thought, they will find their efforts are far more productive of good and lasting benefit.

Read—Look and Listen.

These words are not those of warning at thousands of railroad crossings, they are words of advice to moving picture people everywhere.

As a motto it may be profitably posted over the desk of every man who is in any way responsible for the effective results of good moving picture work.

Read! Read what? Read the trade paper. The Moving Picture World is compiled to be read and read in all its parts; any reader who picks and culls his reading is liable to be one-sided and narrow. The trouble column is to help him, the music notes to harmonize him, the educational column to inspire him. The editorials and other news and comments are all to advise and assist him, making it possible for him in the most intelligent manner to do his duty to himself and the public.

At what shall he look? The screen!—the picture! The eye must be constantly on the picture, critically not cynically; observingly trained to admire, as well as to detect as occasion requires and necessity demands. It is not enough to know the name of the picture; the picture itself must be as much a part of his work as the acting is of the stage manager and critic; he must know everything that is being presented to his patrons. Listening is his next great duty; the comments of his patrons, young and old, form the jury-like verdict upon his efforts. It is not intended that he shall blindly follow what he hears, listening must be analytical, dividing intelligently the good from the bad, and must serve only as a guide whereby to know the true and best public mind. With this threefold method of reading for information, looking for knowledge and listening for evidence, any moving picture man may educate himself to the extent of becoming a capable and intelligent caterer to the public taste.

Not pandering in servile fashion to that which is only productive of dimes and nickels for the time being, but rather creating a taste and demand which arouses both an appetite and desire for that higher order which is always profitable, and more than profitable, because it has the inherent principles of permanency.

A guileless inquirer was recently told (never mind by whom) that you could project a "very good" moving picture, or a lantern slide, by means of a single, double convex lens! A plain bull's eye, in fact! For that, making allowances for possible differences in the qualities of glass, is just what a single double convex lens is, or may be. You can make it of Jena glass; you can make it of just ordinary commercial molten metal. Optically it is a plano-convex lens, no more no less, and therefore subject to all the aberrations in greater or less degree, of all uncorrected lenses. And being an uncorrected lens you cannot possibly project a "very good" moving picture by means of a single (uncorrected) plano-convex lens!

If you could, what on earth would be the good of going to the expense of using a corrected combination for the purpose of projecting moving pictures? None at all! You could do the work with one-eighth the expense; you would have more light through the lens; and inferentially the illuminative qualities of your picture would be better. A very happy state of affairs indeed! Unfortunately, theory demands and practice obliges the use of a chromatically, spherically, astigmatically and definitionally correct lens for projection purposes of every kind, and that is why an uncorrected len is useless for the purpose.

I mention this piece of misleading information not for the purpose of scoring it, but to illustrate the very loose state of knowledge which is extant in the moving picture field. Here we have the spectacle of a large body of men asking for information on specific points and nobody apparently qualified to give it them. What is the consequence? The projection of the picture is in the hands of men unequal to the work, and the result is the public suffers and the business is damaged.

There is too much of this blind leading of the blind in the moving picture field. I speak feelingly. I've studied the theory and practice of moving picture making for years—people say I have it at my finger tips—yet I find it difficult to turn my knowledge to such advantage that I can rent a Fifth Avenue mansion and a villa at Newport. People say that I say that I know it all. I don't. But I know sufficient to prevent my telling a poor devil that he can project a very good picture with an uncorrected lens.

What is the remedy for the deplorable ignorance and superstition which pervades the moving picture field? Schools, colleges? Undoubtedly, if those are properly conducted. Trade papers? Again yes, though some of your lay contemporaries have no use for any publications but their own. Cliques of all kinds, however, is exact knowledge ex-actitudinously (good word that!) exactitudinously dispersed. But where shall we find that valuable commodity? Echo answer, where?

* * *

I've some sympathy for the average operator. He is not a nice man at the best; but when superadded to this, he is not well equipped for his work his case is indeed a hard one. A very wide angle of knowledge is demanded from an operator. If he supplies the goods he is not too well paid, what'ever he gets. If he is really expert at all branches of work he is likely to meet the fate of a newspaper friend of mine, temporarily working as an operator, and a very good operator, too, and he told that he was too good for his job. So watch your step.

* * *

Experience is the best guide in all things. The stationary photographer, I know many men who years ago submitted themselves to voluntary examinations for the purpose of obtaining certificates of knowledge in the science and practice of photography. Having passed some stiff tests, they got their certificates, launched out into business and were successful. The same thing, it seems to me, is of equal application in the moving picture field. State and size cards are probably right enough as far as they go; but they don't go far enough. You want some authoritative agency whereby the operator's real knowledge can be effectively tested and certified.

Now, boys, don't throw stones at me; I'm not your enemy! Au contraire, I'm your friend; I'm everybody's friend. Some of your difficulties make me smile, especially in a land where the free library is so rife. What has Mr. Carnegie spent his money for? To provide books of reference for those seeking knowledge and information. Verban sat sapientia. A word to the wise is sufficient. Now, please, everybody, more about uncorrected lenses for projection purposes.

BROTHERS IN ARMS MEET ON THE ISLAND OF BERMUDA.

Sam Long, of the Kalem Company, on his tour of the world, stopped off at Bermuda with his wife and Mr. and Mrs. McQuillin, to enjoy the beauties of the land of the lily and the rose. The first one to greet Mr. Long and his party was jolly Bill Steiner, of the Yankee Film Company, and Pierce Kingsley, Bill's director. After a delightful drive around the island, Mr. Long and his party attended a ball at the Hamilton Hotel in the evening, and returned to his ship in the wee hours of the morning and set sail for St. Thomas, wishing Bill Steiner and the Yankee Film Company a pleasant and profitable stay on the Island of Bermuda. Mr. Steiner has two directors and 46 people in his party, who have been touring out four reels per week for the past two months.

The Yankee Film Company's release of Friday, April 14th, is a story woven into and around the Bermuda Hunt Club Derby, owing to the long stay that the Yankee Companies have made in Bermuda and the acquaintanceship they have formed, they were enabled to utilize all the incidents connected with the Derby and strange to relate, they selected for their preliminary scenes, with Jockey Queen, who rode the winner of the Derby and the mare May Amelia, which won the Derby.

SHAKESPEARE ON THE SCREEN.

Lovers of the classic drama have a treat in store when the Great Northern presentation of "Hamlet" is released two weeks from now. The immortal story of "Hamlet, the Prince of Denmark," is known to every reader of English literature and it is the highest ambition of every actor to enact the title role. In this film the Great Northern Company secured the services of the Royal Theater Company of Copenhagen, each is equivalent to saying that Scenes, Marlowe, Macduff, the late Mansfield and the celebrities ranked the leading parts.

The Great Northern Company is at the present time producing what the reasons was supposed to have taken place and the scenery around the castle is beautifully portrayed. We are told that the King of Denmark was an interested spectator of the proceedings and since the Great Northern Company is ever wise to make the showing of some great drama a masterpiece of realism. The cast is carefully selected and the costumes worn were the amazing altogether the film is one which goes to the Great Northern Film Company to the front rank of successful the silent drama. The demand for the film will no doubt be great and exchanges should place their orders early to avoid disappointment.

JACK BINNS VS. VITAGRAPH.

Jackie Grandon has resumed the fight against the Vitagraph $25,000 damages, unless he, Binns, is willing to accept $5,000 and the costs of the case. The judge against the corporation the Binns lawyer failed to show cause for damages and quilibus the case by introducing newspaper comments at the trial. An appeal by Binns' counsel is announced.

AMERICAN FILMS IN EUROPE.

We hear from the Western Import and Film Company, 1 Regent Court, London, England, that the Head of the American Film Mfg. Co. are meeting with excellent success and that they need their expertise. This is not to be considered as, as the subjects and scenes are so quite different to the features made here, while our pictures are of world-wide interest.

C. A. writes: "After reading so many articles in the M. P. World in regard to playing the pictures I am taking the liberty of asking you on that subject. We are using piano and drums, with effects; and we are just lately graduated from vaudeville. Some of the fine points of the picture game are yet to come. I noticed you published a program for 'The Deluge,' as played by King's Orchestra. We played that picture a few weeks ago and it is in regard to that class of picture I wish information. We opened with 'O the Away Maidens Gay,' from Martha, till the dancing began, then segue to the ballet music from Faust. For Noah's prayer we played the "Prayer from Zampa," till Noah's entrance (in the next scene), then the opening of "Peace and Peasant" until the animals were to be taken into the ark. Then we played Part 1 animando till the storm scene. We played the storm from "William Tell" and the picture closed with "The Palms." Now my reason for writing you is not to tell you what music we played, but to ask your opinion on same. We work the pictures p. and f. as the action requires and try to use the right music. All the soft music is played on the bells by the drummer. My impression of 'The Deluge' is that the first part calls for gay music and not a heavy march as per program. Am I right or should all "heavy" pictures be opened "heavy" regardless of the action? In foreign pictures we use very little "heavy" patriotic music, and follow the same policy in all soldier pictures. Is that correct or do you want people to applaud whether the picture calls for it or not?"

From my best recollection of the picture "The Deluge" I believe your musical setting of it was excellent. Though not religious, your numbers were dignified and serious, and that is the main point. The brief mention I made was not intended as a complete synopsis of the music I said it belonged to the "Biblical" class of pictures and should be treated as such, and gave the essential numbers of that style of music as played by Mr. King's orchestra, merely as an illustration. Occasionally I append to my letter suggestions for music to certain pictures, and these are worked out completely with cues to start and stop each number. They can be played with good effect as they stand, though it must be understood I offer them as suggestions only, which may be elaborated and improved upon at pleasure. As to your questions, I certainly do not hold that "heavy" pictures should be opened with "heavy" music regardless of the action. The music should follow the action as closely as is practical, no matter what the character of the picture may be. I say "as closely as practical," for the reason that I believe that in many pictures with rapidly changing scenes it is better to adhere to the dominant theme of the picture rather than change music with each shift of scene. As to the last question, I have repeatedly said that we should try to convey to the audience the impression which the producer intended his picture to make. The tears, laughter and applause have their logical place, and if we can assist in getting these, well and good; but in their proper places. You have the proper ideas; one can see that you are an old hand in the "show business."

M. B. W. says: "I have been reading your articles for several weeks and find them very helpful. Have not got all of them and wish you would tell me what number they began in so I could send for the back numbers. I have not been long in the picture-playing business and find it difficult to select the most appropriate music. I wish you would tell me what to get and how to use it, and if it is not asking too much I wish you would tell me just how to "work up" pictures of the dramatic kind. The others do not give me so much trouble. Please do not print my name."

I wish with all my heart I could tell you just how to work up pictures. I have had more than one appeal of this kind and I believe the writers are sincere, but nobody can tell another just how to apply the proper music to pictures yet unseen. I have so much to learn (so have we all) and the best I or anyone can do is to give a few hints out of our own experience. To those with a dramatic instinct, these hints often are enough to set them on the right road. If they have had previous experience in dramatic work, the task is easy as there is much similarity in the two branches. I can say this much, however: the most salient points in dramatic pictures are these:

"Pathetic scenes, mysterious scenes and scenes of an agitated nature." The first (pathetic) is easily recognized and needs no description. They differ in degree, some being of a very plaintive character, while others are only suggestive; semi-plaintive we might say. Your music, of course, should be in keeping. I have mentioned a great many numbers of this kind in previous letters (beginning Nov. 26, 1910). A very mournful scene is best expressed by music in a minor key. These numbers are all to be played slowly and usually softly, though a swell may often be made effective when at the close of the picture or the climax of a scene.

Mysterious scenes: These are varied, but are nearly always suggestive of approaching danger. Burglars, creeping savages, somebody lying in ambush, and the many scenes of a similar kind are accompanied by stealthy (sometimes called "sneaky") music. A common form is slow and staccato (like picking the violin strings). Another is a bass solo in the left hand while the right plays a soft accompaniment (tremolo or sustained chords). Minor keys are best. The most satisfactory music of this description will be found in the regular editions of melo-dramatic music. The action is generally slow and the music likewise. Pictures like "Frankenstein," or those showing ghosts or magic, etc., require mysterious music of a weird type, of which the first movement of Bendix' "Pasha's Dream" is a splendid example. Schubert's "Earl King" is a good number, though its rapid movement gives it an agitated character.

The last mentioned, i. e., "scenes of an agitated nature," was spoken about at some length in answer to "Virginia's" letter, Moving Picture World of March 25th. Now, these three classes: pathetic, mysterious and agitated, while they do not by any means include all the various scenes found in dramatic pictures, are common to all. Being very pronounced they are easily recognizable and I should advise you to begin with these. Provide yourself with some good dramatic music and memorize a few numbers of each kind so you will be able to watch the picture without looking at your notes. So long as the story is running along smoothly without anything happening in particular, play a waltz or two-four intermezzo or anything which does not suggest any particular action. (Don't play a lively waltz or "rag" march unless the scene is lively.) Then when a scene occurs where you can use your dramatic music, play it. As I said before, these scenes are easily recognizable. In this way you can at least get a start and once started, your experience will widen and you can develop according to the amount of practice; for, like everything else, this is largely a matter of practice. This is the best I can offer at present in answer to your question. Let me hear from you again and if I have not made myself clear, perhaps I can add something to it. I shall be glad to give all the assistance I can, though I repeat, I also have much to learn in this work.

Another Query regarding drummers' traps and sound effects. At my request Mr. Wm. E. King (Orpheum Theater, Chicago) has kindly prepared a list of some of the most essential effects in ordinary use. Mr. King has invented a number of sound effects, notably a contrivance for using compressed air to imitate all sorts of water effects, steam exhaust and many other sounds—even a sneeze. I append the list:

BELLS.

Church chimes (at least three of these, with deep tone). Engine bell (used also for farm-bell, factory bell, etc.). Clock-strike. Cow-bell and sleigh-bells. Telephone bell (also used for call-bell, door-bell, bicycle, alarm clock, etc.). Gong for fire or police-patrol, street car, etc. Small hand-bell (for various uses).

WHISTLES AND HORNS.

Locomotive (tug-boat, factory, etc.). Fog-horn. Police whistle. Calliope (two sizes). Birds (ad.-lib.). Cuckoo. Auto-horns (several sizes). Dinner-horn (fish-horn).

Baby cry, rooster crow, hen-cackle, duck, dog, cat, cow, owl, lion-roar, donkey, pig and sheep. (May be added to ad.-lib.).

Telegraph click (stock exchange ticker).

Chains to rattle (for manacles, etc.), train effect, wind-machine, thunder-sheet, rain, waves, splash, wagon-rumble, horse-hoofs, wood-crash (for breaking timbers, etc.), glass-crash, squeak (for machinery, rusty hinge, etc.), slap-stick, pop-gun, gun and pistol-shots, sword-clash and anvil with hammers.

Further information may be had by writing to the Leedy Manufacturing Co., 1055 E. Palmer Street, Indianapolis, Ind. I cannot close this article withhout mentioning a musical novelty called "The Electric Saucer Bells" (J. C. Deagan, manufaturer). I have examined these bells several times and my liking has increased with each test. They are played from a key-board like a piano and the tone is very musical. It is very easy to play, responds to the lightest touch and will be a valuable addition to any orchestra. This endorsement is entirely unsolicited by anybody whatsoever. I give it because the merits of the instrument deserve the consideration of every manager and drummer, and I earnestly recommend it to your notice.

[We are pleased to read Mr. Sinns' comment on the Deagan bells and by the set we have in our Chicago display room we are satisfied that they are meeting the approval of every visitor.—Eds.]

Los Angeles.

By Richard V. Spencer.
(Pacific Coast Correspondent of the World.)

A Correction.—An article on page 581 of the March 18th issue of the World, entitled: "Indians War on Films," contains a misstatement of facts that the writer would like to correct. The paragraph in question quotes: "One of the protesting Indians said today that he had gone into one of the motion picture theaters here (Washington, D. C.), where a picture was shown in which a young Indian graduate of one of the non-reservation schools was the chief figure. He was shunned by the members of his tribe upon his return to them, took to drink, killed a man and fled, but was killed after a long chase. This was denounced as an untrue portrayal of the Indian."

Now, then for the facts that are well known to the writer, for the events depicted took place near this city. The film that the Indian critics, was made by the stock company of the Selig forces. The Indian reviewer who criticised the film as a false portrayal of Indian life is mistaken, for the film is a dramatization from real life of an event that occurred on the Eastern California and Western Nevada deserts some four years ago. In the local newspaper files of that period may be read columns matter relating to the efforts of California and Nevada sheriffs to capture the original "Willie Boy," an Indian who, after being educated, was shunned by his tribe, and turning to drink for solace, while in his cups, committed a murder and fled to the desert pursued by a half dozen sheriffs and posses who finally cornered him in the desert country and forced him to commit suicide to prevent capture and trial. "The "Willie Boy" film story was written by Mr. Hobart Bosworth, leading man and assistant director of the Selig Western Company. Mr. Bosworth also staged the story and played the leading role of the desperado "Willie Boy."

Patent Litigation.—The Motion Picture Patents Company has filed in the local United States circuit court a bill of complaint against Fred J. Balshofer, director and manager of the Bison Company, and the Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles, asking that the defendants be compelled to give to the United States marshal a certain camera alleged to have been deposited in the vaults of the Commercial National Bank by Mr. Balshofer, said camera said to embody inventions patented by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff in the bill of complaint before the court asks the court to order that the camera be taken to a New York circuit court, to be held there pending the outcome of a case brought in that court by the plaintiff here for alleged violation of patent rights.

War Pictures.—A dispatch from the Arizona international boundary line states that a company of moving picture actors with a camera have arrived at the line and will try and secure a series of pictures of the Mexican Revolution being fought out in the vicinity. The name of the company was not mentioned in the dispatch, but it is probable the Western company of the American Film Manufacturing Company who for some time past have been working on film stories in Arizona.

California.—A. E. Dubois, formerly vice-president and manager of the California Motion Picture Manufacturing Company, has severed all connections with the company. M. F. Brooks, a director of the company, has assumed charge of the studio. Mr. Holland, the president of the company, has gone to San Diego in the interests of the company.

Actress Ill.—Miss Virginia Chester, playing ingenue parts with the Pathe West Coast Company, has been very ill for the past two weeks. At this writing her condition has improved, and a few weeks more should see her back at work in the pictures.

Pathe.—The Pathe Company have returned from their trip to the Malibu Mountain country. While there they were caught in a tumultuous cloudburst that played havoc with their scenery and nearly washed them down Santa Monica Canyon with the flood.

Optic Theater Opened.—The Optic Theater, located on the west side of Main Street, between Fifth and Sixth streets, opened Saturday evening, the 18th, to a large appreciative audience. The building is of brick and steel construction and was erected for Mrs. Neanette G. Donovan, of St. Louis, who recently bought for $135,000 the lot on which it stands. The improvement cost another $30,000, and included two small stores flanking the theater lobby. The new theater is 50 by 100 feet, and has a seating capacity of 800. The theater is tastefully decorated. All wood opera chairs with iron standards have been installed. One feature of the building is the forced-draught heating and ventilating system, which changes the air in the auditorium every six minutes. The theater was erected for moving picture projection, but is also equipped with a stage and sunken orchestra pit, and can be turned into a vaudeville theater, if the occasion so demands. A daylight curtain will be used. The theater is equipped with a $4,000 pipe organ. The lobby is in tile, mirror wainscot, and grained arched ceiling with staff ornamentation wired for numerous frosted electric globes. In the center of the ceiling has been placed a beautiful art glass dome light. The theater is using a five-piece orchestra, and is showing first-run pictures.

Records Broken.—The past week has been an excellent one for the local exhibitors. Last Saturday the Isis (licensed), the Bijou (independent) and the California (licensed) broke their individual day receipt records.

State Censorship Bill Amended.—The state censorship bill, known as the Strowbridge Bill, which passed the Senate, was amended in the Assembly by the removal of the clause prohibiting the exhibition of crime pictures, and by striking out the word "guardian" in the provision requiring that all children attending such places must be accompanied by an adult guardian. It was also provided to permit the exhibition of the popular Indian and Western pictures.

Union.—The Union Theater (independent) on Main Street, between Second and Third streets, is having a new box office built. The work is continuing without interruption to business.

Bell.—The Bell Theater on East Fifth Street, opened this week and is playing to good business. Three licensed pictures, and three acts of vaudeville are shown for a 5c admission. The new theater is located in a populous district and has no nearby competition so they ought to do a record-breaking business.

Pasadena Censorship.—Pasadena censorship has been amended so that its regulations are not so drastic. Time was when this city, through its censorship, barred all drama films and many comedy subjects. While the lid has not been entirely removed, Pasadena exhibitors are glad that the change has come about and are humming the "Every Little Bit Helps" refrain.

Bijou.—The Talley circuit is change from licensed to independent films has enjoyed what are good business as under normal conditions are L. M. Daly's Bijou, of course not that he has no luck coming. This theater, up to a week ago, used only second service since it was built several years ago. The theater is getting first-run independent service from Miles Brothers exchange.

African Pictures Praised.—The recent Pathe Buffalo Jones' pictures met with a warm reception in the West. The films were featured by Manager Daly, Hogan & Hansen, and other exhibitors. Patrons of these theaters praised the pictures without exception. Many of them spent their nickels and dimes for a second visit by bringing their friends and families, and inquired when similar pictures would be shown.

Business Good.—All the exhibitors report that summer business is beginning to pick up. Exhibitors are sitting up their fans and getting everything in shape for operations. The recent three days of summer temperature boosted receipts and is a foretaste of what is to follow. The exhibitors at the different beach resorts from now on will reap a golden harvest. Work on the new Cinna and Hyman beach theaters continues at a feverish pace. Both houses plan to open on May 30th, the opening day of the beach season. The Cinna theater will be located at Ocean Park and the Hyman enterprise at Venice, as rival first-run pictures and vaudeville will be used at both houses.

Los Angeles as a Producing Center.

By Richard V. Spencer

Los Angeles within the short period of two years has reached a position in the moving picture manufacturing field where it is second only to New York. There are several good reasons for this remarkable growth, chiefly of which, of course, is the climatic advantages of Southern California. To understand the climate of this paradise of moving picture men, one must turn to the maps and notice the topographical features. Bordering Southern California on the north and east are two large mountain ranges. The first, or inner range, the Tehachapis, with an average altitude of 6,000 feet, are only nine miles from the city limits at the closest place. Beyond them lie patches of desert and semi-arid lands with here and there a fertile farming valley. Fifty miles beyond the Tehachapis lie the San Bernardino chain, the higher peaks of which exceed 11,000 feet and are snow-capped the year round. In the winter this high chain turns aside the blizzards that sweep down from the north and east, and in the summer they keep out the hot winds of the desert beyond.

The U. S. Weather Bureau reports show the following thirty-four-year average: Perfectly clear days, one hundred and sixty four; partly cloudy, one hundred and fifty-six; (coming under this head are conditions preceding and following storms, which are less than ¼, and the other ¾ are days with early morning fogs, which, however, always clear away by noon, leaving the rest of the day cloudless). Cloudy and rain, forty-six (in which photography is impossible). In other words, the climate of Southern California provides 320 days for good photography, out of the 365.

Within a twenty-mile radius of Los Angeles may be found conditions suitable for exteriors from a tropic to a frigid background, and from desert to jungle. Twenty miles to the west lie the pleasure beaches with a score of high class beach resorts within a forty minutes' trolley ride to the city. In the summertime the beach attendance runs into the hundreds of thousands. There may be taken resort comedies with an Atlantic City or Coney Island background. Within the same radius on the same beach were taken the marine dramas made famous by the Selig and Biograph companies. Here were taken such pictures as: "The Unchanging Sea" (Biograph); "A Tale of the Sea" (Selig); "Fisher-Folks" (Biograph); "The Buccaneers" (Selig); "A Message of the Sea" (Bison); the sea scenes from "The Padre," a recent Selig release, and others. These pictures have been admired the world over for their beautiful scenic surroundings and perfect photography.

For scenes of city life there is no need to go beyond Los Angeles. The last Federal census in 1910 gave the city a population of 319,198. Various street scenes and scenes in the city parks have been pictured by the Selig, Biograph and Essanay companies. Those views taken ranged from comedy scenes to scenic. The winter population of the city approximates 500,000, which includes the tourists and wealthy guests that come to spend the winter months. As a theatrical center Los Angeles is known the world over for its splendid legitimate and moving picture palaces, and the immense number of them for a city of this size. The two local dramatic stock companies, the Belasco and the Burbank are known to be two of the best stock companies in the whole country. The Orpheum management in May will open their new theater. The building is one of the most costly and beautiful theater buildings west of New York. Of the moving picture theaters, Clune's Broadway, The Hyman, Tally's, The College and Clune's Main Street Theater cost close to $50,000 each to build, without the cost of the real estate or lease. It is needless to say that each are of excellent design and of excellent appointments throughout. With the growth of the city dramatically there came the booking agencies, the scene painting studios, theatrical costumers, and other supply companies. Los Angeles is famous for its beautiful parks and fine residence districts, exteriors of which occasionally creep into the films.

Within the same twenty-mile radius may be found some of the most beautiful country homes and gardens in the world. Several of these have been photographed by the Selig and Biograph companies, among which were the famous sunken gardens of the Busch estate in Pasadena, and the residence of Rudolph Schiffman of the same city. A scenic mountain railway offers the weary tourist an allurement in the shape of a trip from roses to the snow line in forty minutes.

Within the same radius and near Pasadena are two historic missions, San Gabriel and San Fernando. Here were photographed "The Two Brothers" (Biograph); "The Padre" (Selig), and other films, the story of which was written around the aged missions.

Los Angeles and vicinity have acquired their reputation in the production of Western and Indian pictures. Here, of all places, is the ideal location for the production of such films. Here is found the necessary rolling country cut up by foothills, treacherous canyons and lofty mountain ranges in the background. Within ten minutes' ride of Los Angeles is Griffith Park, the largest public park in the world. In this park have been produced nine-tenths of the Bison films of cowboy and Indian life. Here, too, the Selig, Kalem and Biograph companies have taken many pictures, most of them Westerns.

Each of the companies working here have their own ideas of location. The Selig Company chose Edendale, a city suburb, and have here erected a $75,000 plant. Within a block of them is the Pathe West Coast Studio, which, when completed, will probably represent a similar investment. A block below the Pathe Studio on the same side of the street is the Bison Studio. It is shortly to be enlarged and improved with new buildings. The Biograph Company last year occupied temporary quarters in Pasadena, but this year finds them at home in their new studio at Pico and Georgia streets in the heart of the city. The studio is to be permanent and will be occupied every winter by the company. Nine miles away, near Glendale, the Kalem Company have erected a studio in the foothills for the production of their Western and Indian films. Some sixty miles away, near Redlands, the Essanay Western Company are hard at work. At Long Beach, a local beach resort, a new Independent producing company is rushing operations to get into the market with their film. The company is known as The California Motion Picture Manufacturing Company. Another new Independent company of a similar name, known as The California Motion Picture Company, are also getting ready to enter the field. They will erect a local studio in the near future.

Many Eastern moving picture manufacturers have long had their eyes on Southern California as the only available locality in the United States possessing the necessary clear weather for perfect photography, nearness to market, scenery and other conditions necessary for moving picture production during the winter months. Transportation is another factor that must enter into the question. Los Angeles is the center of an interurban electric system whose many lines and divisions offer safe, rapid transportation to all parts of the country. Here, in a rapidly growing, modern big city, may be found every condition for films of city life. Here, too, is a surplus of high class theatrical talent ready and willing to give their best efforts for the uplift of the pictures. The city has produced such moving picture stars as Hobart Bosworth, leading man for the Selig Company; Florence Barker (Biograph leads), Dorothy Bernard (Ingenue leads for the Biograph Company), and other actors and actresses of equal talent. Each year finds Eastern winter conditions more unsatisfactory for motion picture work. Here weather conditions and climate permit work and photography the year around. The Selig forces lead the California rush, and thither they have lured the rest of the colony. More Eastern producers are known to be making preparations to come this year, and eventually Los Angeles, by reason of the few of the several advantages above set forth, will become known to the world, not as the second largest picture producing center, but the largest, bar none.

Chicago

Mr. Louis E. Riner is meeting such a success with his One Drop Oil, the oil that will not gum, smoke, smell nor burn and with his Bull Dog Cement, for both films, that he found it necessary to move to new and more commodious quarters. Mr. Riner has leased an office with a store front at 520 Jackson Boulevard, and with a telephone and increased help, he is now in close touch with the film business centered in the loop. When we called to see Mr. Riner in his new place and saw his helper filling bottles, we had no idea that so much oil could be used to show the little pictures.

The tearing down of the old buildings, 77-79-81 Clark Street, is forcing the following film firms to seek new quarters: American Film Service, Brayton Mfg. Co., Anti-Trust Co., Geo. Hoke Supply Co., Unique Film Service, U. S. Film Exchange, J. B. Clinton, etc.

The coming first of May will also force Eugene Cline to move as his present offices are to be torn down to make room for certain improvements. Mr. Cline has secured new offices at ??? Dearborn Street; today it is known as 85 Dearborn, and after the first of April it will be a new number and then N. Dearborn.

April first is going to bring a lot of confusion to the film industry in Chicago, as every manufacturer, exchange, supply house, etc., will change numbers and will have to place after the number the words north, south, east or west. The Moving Picture World was known at 166 Washington Street; after April first it will be known as 167 W. Washington. The Standard Film Exchange known as 161 E. Washington Street, will be known as 172 W. Washington Street. Geo. Kleine will be no more 52 State Street, but a new number and North State Street. No one located in the loop will escape this confusion and the visitors to Chicago will have a pretty hard time of it. Pity the poor letter carriers, they will have their hands full; and even today, Chicagoans are guessing all the time, if it is the new or the old number.

New England Notes.

Buffalo Jones at Andover Academy.

Buffalo Jones made a trip to Andover, Mass., to lecture before the students of Phillip's Andover Academy, at the request of Mrs. Gideon Scull, whose son, Guy, went with the colonel on his trip to the African Jungles to lasso wild animals. The lecture was a great success, and Buffalo Jones may be forced to make a second trip to the academy to lecture on his exploits.

The Crown Theater, a small moving picture house in Pawtucket, R. I., closed recently. Poor business closed this house, which was too small to stand the competition of its larger neighbors.

The Empire Theater, Lowell, Mass., has changed owners, as F. L. Le Duc has sold out his share of the house.

A bill to allow Sunday baseball has been a feature of the Massachusetts Legislature. While arguing the merits of the bill one legislator made the remark that it "was better to play baseball on Sunday than to drink moving picture whiskey. Massachusetts has a reason to be proud of her law-makers—that is, some of them.

Messrs. Delmore and True have decided to change the name of their theater at Dover, N. H., from "Clements" to the more lofty name of "Star." This house is to be entirely remodelled, with everything new. A large electric sign reading S-T-A-R is to be one of the features of the front. A large balcony is to be built also. This house is doing an excellent business, according to reports.

Mr. George Hallaby, of the Scenic Theater, New Britain, Conn., is having several improvements made on his house. The Scenic is showing daylight pictures and vaudeville to excellent patronage.

The very great majority of New England M. P. theaters report receipts not at all affected by Lent.

The Central Square Theater, Lynn, exhibited the "Passion Play" March 20-25. This picture is a great attraction, and its popularity is undiminished. Col. William Stanton, manager of the Central Square, has decided to change his vaudeville acts bi-weekly. The Central Square has improved since its policy has been changed by Mr Stanton.

Mr S. Z. Poli, the well known theatrical man, lost two moving picture theaters owing to a fire which took place in New Haven recently. Mr Poli has announced that he will rebuild both houses, and that the new "Bijou Dream" and "Comique" will be two of the finest moving picture theaters in Connecticut.

Mike Sheedy, the well known New England theatrical man, has acquired the Scenic Theater, Hartford, Conn., which he will run as a "pop" vaudeville and picture house. Mr B. E. Dobbs, one of Mr Sheedy's staff from Bridgeport, will manage the house. Mr Sheedy acquired this house from Mr H. C. Young, who ran the Scenic as a straight picture house since 1906.

INSIDE INFORMATION.

The World's New England representative has been informed from a most reliable source that the Globe Theater, Washington Street, will very shortly be moving pictures and vaudeville. This theater built to play first class legitimate attractions, has found its location not conducive to the best results. The last two years have seen the Globe playing "pop" vaudeville and picture shows the summer months, only to return to the "straight" in the fall. This was due to the fact that, under the lease then existing, the Globe was to play strictly first-class attractions only. This clause was waived, but during the summer only. A new lease has been very recently put into effect, in which this clause has been cancelled. Therefore, as soon as existing contracts with road companies, etc., are fulfilled, the Globe will return to "real popular amusement," and will stay there indefinitely. The Globe, when making its former excursions into the picture and vaudeville realm, acted very injuriously upon the trade of two nearby moving picture theaters, forcing their admission rates down to a five-cent basis. The chances are that the sledding will become intolerable for these houses when the Globe inaugurates the 10c admission signs once more, and stays at it.

FILMS SHOW AUTO MAKING.

Two automobile companies found the M. P. to be the best method of demonstrating the ideas incorporated in their manufacture, and on Tuesday, March 28, several thousand feet of M. P. of the E-M-F "30," and the Flanders "20," were exhibited at the Hotel Lenox. The World's New England representative had the pleasure of viewing these films, and there can be no doubt but what the pictures are of aid to the auto companies. The reels show the automobiles in their whole process of construction, beginning with the crude material. Among the steps shown are the foundries, assembling, testing, racing, hill-climbing, etc. During the presentation of these pictures on the screen, members of the sales force explain the details. This idea is primarily for the dealers who will be better acquainted with their product, and more easily able to explain the various virtues of their cars.

THE PRESS AND THE PICTURE.

"The Easiest Way," which came to a sudden end in Boston when the authorities placed a ban over the play, was the cause of a few flings at the innocent picture by one of our local dailies. Here is a specimen: "There are cheap variety houses, music halls and M. P. shows in Boston reeking with dramatic filth." * * * This is a sample of what one of our local dailies has been handing the picture lately. It may be stated that M. P. theaters in Boston do not find the advertising columns of the paper in question of use, and, consequently, insert no advertisements in that paper.

On Tuesday, March 21, Mr J. J. Cahill arrived at the exhibiting rooms of the General Film Company an hour late, and missed viewing the Tuesday releases. Mr. Cahill has never before been late within the memory of his brother managers; he was closely questioned as to the wherefore of his tardiness. Mr. Cahill was too busy to tell them, and refused to give any reason. However, to show the boys that his judgment was of the usual quality, he made his regular excellent choice of the Patents Company's releases for his several theaters.

Buffalo Jones arrived in Boston last week, and paid a visit to the General Film Company, where he renewed his acquaintance with some of our local managers. Buffalo Jones may possibly come to Boston again a little later on, to lecture on his own pictures in some of the Boston M. P. houses.

The Pekin Theater has again closed its doors, and ex-Pekin manager, Ed. Price, is now to be found managing the Back Bay Theater, Dartmouth Street.

One of our local houses presented its patrons with George Scotia, ex-convict and train robber, who has now reformed, in an illustrated lecture entitled, "Folly of a Life of Crime." This is Mr. Scotia's life story, with illustrations.

THE INTERNATIONAL FILM TRADERS MOVE.

Having outgrown their present quarters at 13-21 Fourth Avenue, New York City, the International Film Traders Company have leased the loft house to be closed on May 1, and will occupy the entire premises as heavy consumers, as seating accommodations. The gentle spring is at hand, and with gentle spring comes old mould, this spring that will stir the sap (like a feather to the commodious new offices, which will be ready at 1 West 13th Street, after April 1st. Every possible convenience for moving pictures is now in the building, and has a personal touch, as with the management of the International Film Traders Company, let us hope that they move into a pleasant office, being as the proposition stands, one of real comfort.

Cooling the Theater. An exhibitor in the South wants to know the best way to keep his theater cool. He says that he has eight fourteen-inch fans, but that they are not enough, and he would like to know from other exhibitors if a refrigerating system would be necessary or not. Will some exhibitor who has been successful in keeping his theater comfortably cool in summer, kindly communicate his methods to the readers of the Moving Picture World?

Measuring Light Speed.—Mr. John B. Lantz, Chicago, Ill., writes: "I have often heard, and seen written, an expression of the speed of light. Will you kindly explain through the department how its speed is measured?"

Well, Neighbor Lantz, your question is of considerable interest, though it perhaps has no direct bearing on projection. So enormous is the speed of light that up to a comparatively short while ago no effort was made to ascertain how fast it really moved. In fact, no method of measuring the light movement was known, the accepted theory being that light moved throughout the universe instantaneously. Around the sun many planets revolve and many of these planets have smaller satellites, similar to our own moon. One of Jupiter's satellites, of which there are four, had been closely observed for a long period and it was found to become eclipsed at regular intervals. This, it was seen occurred before its time, when the earth was at point "A" (see sketch) nearest Jupiter, and behind its time when the earth was at point "B," its greatest distance from the planet Jupiter, the difference in time of eclipse of the satellite being 16½ minutes. A Danish astronomer, Romer, in the year 1675, came to the conclusion that this difference of 16½ minutes must be due to the time required by the light to travel from point "A" to point "B," or across the diameter of the earth's orbit, which is about 186,000,000 miles. Dividing 186,000,000 miles by 16½x60 gives a speed of light of approximately 189,000 miles per second. This was the first method of measuring light speed and it was not susceptible of proof except as one reasons these things out by the laws of cause and effect. Since that time, however, another method has been evolved which proves itself. This is known as Fizeau's method. A toothed wheel was constructed containing 720 teeth and, of course, 720 spaces between; 8,663 meters away was a mirror acurately reflecting a ray of light, so that it practically doubled back on its own path. A ray of light was passed through the space between two of the teeth on the periphery of the wheel, caught on the mirror and reflected back to the eye of an observer stationed at and looking through one of the spaces in the wheel. Now if the wheel be rotated at a given, uniform speed certain definite results will be attained. It takes the light a certain, given time to travel from the wheel to the mirror and back, in this experiment, a distance of 17,326 meters. In 1/720 of a revolution of the wheel each of the 720 teeth of the wheel will occupy relatively the space just filled by the tooth immediately ahead of it. It therefore follows that in half that time each tooth will be moved ahead into the position previously occupied by a space between the teeth. Now the observer will see the reflected ray as a bright speck in the mirror. It is therefore possible to so adjust the wheel speed that a tooth will move into the place just occupied by a space in precisely the time the light took to travel the 17,326 meters, in which case the bright speck will disappear. This Tizeau found to occur when the wheel speed was 12.6 revolutions per minute, each turn thus occupied 1 divided by 12.6 seconds and the teeth and spaces changed positions as often as 1 divided by 12.6x2x270, which figures out as 1 divided by 18,144 of a second. In other words, the result showed the light speed to be 17,326x18,144 meters per second, or, reduced to miles it would be 17,326x18,144x39,368 divided by 12 divided by 5,280 per second. Later experiments (Cornu, 1876), with better appliance (of the same sort) reduced this to 300,400,000 meters per second, or about 186,000 miles, as shown by astronomical measurements. If the wheel were turned at a certain increased speed the light ray again appeared, but this time through the second space and when the speed of the wheel was trebled above the first test the light was again eclipsed, being caught on the second tooth and so on, thus proving the correctness of its operation. This may be a little hard to understand, but I think you will succeed in grasping the idea if you study the above carefully. At any rate, the two foregoing methods were two of several used to test and determine the speed of light.

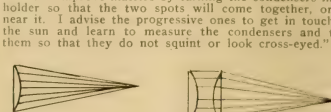
A Condenser Stunt.—Mr. C. Henningsen, Stillwater, Minn., writes as follows: "I comply with your request (page 530, March 11th issue) as regards the condenser proposition. Referring to the article above mentioned, take the ruler and any two condensers out in the sunshine, measure the focus, or find the 'burning point' and get the distance in inches with a ruler. It will show like this ('A' and 'B' in sketch). Now, put them in the condenser holder, the long focus lens next the carbons. If they are the right kind they should show like 'C' in the sketch, but as cheap lenses and condenser holders are not perfect, you may find they show like 'D' in the sketch, which will produce a bad effect on the curtain. You can improve matters by turning the condensers in their holder so that the two spots will come together, or very near it. I advise the progressive ones to get in touch with the sun and learn to measure the condensers and to set them so that they do not squint or look cross-eyed."



Well, old man, I guess you have put one over on the editor this time. I was not aware of the fact that any such conditions would or could arise, as you describe. In fact, if it can or does, then are all the laws of the refraction of light, as I understand it, set at defiance.

Likes the World.—Franklin, Pa., writes: "We are subscribers to the Moving Picture World and consider it the best moving picture paper printed. We are pleased with the way you treat both patent and independent manufacturers. We believe the World is the best booster the exhibitors have and are glad it is not like some of the oppostion papers, since all some of them seem to know how to do is knock. We firmly believe, however, that every time they knock the World the knock is in reality a boost. Will you kindly advise us through the Trouble Department as to whether the mercury arc rectifier made by the General Electric Company which transforms A.C. into D.C. is a practical machine and if the D.C. furnished is exactly the same and gives same results as if generated with a D.C. dynamo?"

Well, it is strange, Franklin, how great men's minds run along the same channels, but do you know that you have expressed just exactly the concensus of public opinion. As to the rectifier, it is a thoroughly practical machine and the current delivered is the same as that from a direct current dynamo. The machine is giving excellent satisfaction, according to reports from exhibitors all over the country.

High Jinks by Seattle Union.—Mr. L. L. Goldsmith, Press Agent, Local Union No. 154, I. A. T. S. E., Seattle, Wash., contributes the following: "We hand you herewith under separate cover program and photograph of the first annual grand ball of our organization. The ball, as a whole, was a huge success, mainly for the reason that every member acted as a committee of one to see that it was such. The feature of the evening was beautiful electrical effects and moving pictures during the dances, films being furnished by the Independent Western Film Exchange, Pacific Film Exchange and the Washington Film Service. The General Film Company would not consent to let us run any of their films if we ran any independent film; therefore, as our members work in both independent and licensed houses and we are not in position, for this reason, to show partiality, we were obliged to forego the use of licensed film. Before the ball we had secured large auto trucks with dynamos and was going to run moving pictures and slides up and down the main streets of the city, which would have been a splendid advertisement for us. We had everything ready and went to the chief of police for a permit, which was refused. Our attendance was about 800. Dancing started promptly at 9, and the last note of 'Home Sweet Home' sounded at 3:10 a. m. How is this for decent, respectable hours? Best wishes to yourself and the Trouble Department."

Glad to hear you were so successful with your ball, Seattle, and trust the one a year hence wil be even better. Would have used the photo of the ball, but it failed to come.

Likes It.—Mr. Chas. H. Lynch, box 842, Spring Valley, Ill., writes: "I bought your gelatin slide outfit several months ago and this is the best I have ever seen. Enclosed plea e find $2 for which send me another lot of gelatine."

This letter is merely a sample of a great many similar ones received during the past few months.

Achromatic Lenses.—New Orleans, La., writes: "Will you please explain why the objective lens is made up of four separate lenses, two of which are glued together as a front combination and two not glued, but separated by a spacing ring, as the rear combination?"

It is one of those things that is simple enough in itself and yet one which requires considerable explanation and quite a lot of study to really understand. In the first place, a lens—that is to say, a double convex lens—is nothing more nor less than a series of prisms of different angle, and in order to really understand its action it must be viewed in that light. The cross sections A, B and C shows this idea. In one we have the prisms, the wider angle being nearest the edges, since the wider the angle the more the deflection of the light ray, and vice versa. In "B" we see these prisms joined together in a lens, the whole being completed in "C." You may have to study these three diagrams a little in order to catch the idea. In "A" you must not consider the thickness of the prism, but merely the angle of its sides in relation to a horizontal line drawn through the center. Viewing it thus, you will see that the diagrams "A," "B" and "C" are absolutely correct. Light is composed of a combination of colors. Each of these colors has a different index of refraction, so that if a light beam is passed through a prism and thus retracted, it will be resolved into its component parts or colors after emerging from the prism, by reason of the difference as before set forth. Violet is retracted more than blue, blue is retracted more than yellow and red is retracted the least of all. Light is arbitrarily divided into seven colors, but there is really almost no end to the actual number, since as one blends into another. We have now seen that the light in passing through a lens is resolved into its seven component colors, a mixture of which produces what we term "white light." Now considering the factors of an objective lens as a series of prisms, we shall see that the separation of light will, in a measure, be accomplished—though not entirely so, due, I believe, to the fact that the prisms are not true ones and the refraction, except at the outer rim of the lens, is comparatively slight. This separation of the light is called "achromatic aberration," and in practical effect is to give white light in the center surrounded by a ring of red, outside of which will be a ring of violet. The much as the aberration of separation is greatest near the edge of the lens, a considerable proportion of this could be cut off by stopping the outer edge of the lens with a paper or other opaque ring. This, however, would not entirely do away with the trouble and would be worth as the loss of light. The deviation or refraction of light in a single lens is accompanied by achromatic aberration, and in a single lens this is unavoidable. However, after separating the rays of light by passing through one prism (see D E sketch), thus separating the rays into their colors, if they are passed through a second lens (E) the colors are again blended and the light emerges from the second prism again white. While in the experiment shown with the prisms the rays emerge from the second prism white, they also emerge parallel; there being no deviation; therefore, such rays could not be used for projection. However, if the first prism were made of crown glass and its angle to the degrees as the light rays pass through it, there will be a certain angle formed between the violet and red rays, which same angle would be formed by a flint glass prism having an angle of 37 degrees. Now, if the second prism be of flint glass with an angle of 37 degrees the red and violet rays will re-combine before emerging. The average deviation caused by the first prism is 40 deg. and the deviation by the second prism is 25½ deg., therefore the general deviation will be 40-25.5 or 14½, so that while the deviation is thus obtained, dispersion (separation into colors) at the same time is avoided. Now, if we apply this to lenses and uses a double convex lens of crown glass and a concave lens of flint glass placed in contact, with the two surfaces fitting closely together, practically the same result is obtained as has been above described in the experiment of the prisms, and such a lens is called an achromatic lens. The rear combination is separated by an air space on account of the effect of the heat on the cement. I am not sure that I have made this matter clear to you, New Orleans, but I have done the best I could. I do not like to use technical terms, but in this case it appeared to be absolutely necessary, as there is no other way that I know of to describe these things.

Five Years in One Place.—Mr. H. S. Kunk, Canton, O., writes: "Enclosed find photo of our theater front, located on the main street and the main popular amusement place in Canton. The house is 200 feet long, about 40 feet wide, has a 40 ft. lobby, 105 ft. of theater and 20 ft. of stage, seats 800. It has one of the best operating rooms in this neck of the woods, if not in the entire country. I have been with this theater for five years. I intend taking a picture of the operating room later on and will send you one so that you may see for yourself what it looks like. I like the Moving Picture World very much and do not think I could do without it."

Odeon Theater, Canton, O.

Five years with one house is certainly a good record, Neighbor Kunk. The theater looks a beauty. I shall be glad to have pictures of your operating room, and would suggest to operators having nice rooms that they send in photographs of same wherever possible and unless the negatives are reserved I will undertake to publish them all in the course of time.

An Error.—Princeton, N. J., writes: "Please find enclosed piece of electrical tissue which, if you have never used, think it would be worth while publishing in next issue. I should like to know how to manufacture photographs on tissue and how to transfer any kind of negative to glass. The World has proved and I wish to say that you have the most up-to-date paper for March 11th issue somewhat twisted. What I cannot see is remove the film and turn it end for end, putting the wrong part in the light where you took the good part out."

Well, Princeton, I cannot agree with you on the cam pin business. I do not think it is worth while. A new cam pin isn't costly enough to go to all of that trouble over. I use the word "trouble" advisedly because I presume it would be quite difficult to get the worn part of the pin tight in the hole in the cam. As to the definition of electrical terms, space is so very valuable and there are so many letters each week that I cannot answer at all that I feel I should hardly be justified in publishing the list submitted for the reason that quite a complete electrical dictionary can be had for as little as 25 cents. To reproduce a photograph you must first make a negative from it in a camera. You can get slide glass coated as "positives" and print your photograph on them from the negative by contact, or you can use the glass positive and print with the enlarging camera, or vice versa. However the way your letter reads, I cannot exactly make out what it is you want. I shall be glad to serve you if you will make matters just a little plainer.

Mica Slides.—Mr. J. T. May, Hominy, Okla., writes: "Did you ever hear of making a slide on mica? I took a sheet of mica, such as can be bought in a hardware store and wrote on it with India ink. It doesn't wrinkle, and the ink doesn't spread as it sometimes does on the glass. The letter shows up perfectly on the curtain. Hominy has only about 800 population, but it is a good show town. We seat 185, but sell standing room nearly every night."

There are one or more firms making announcement slides on mica, Friend May, but it is to your credit that you discovered for yourself the fact that mica could be used for this purpose. It is much better than glass.

One More Helped by the Department.—Mr. Gordon Le Feare, Toronto, Ont., writes: "In a recent issue of the World there was an article accompanied by a drawing of a three-wing inside shutter for a Powers No. 5. I am running two Powers No. 5 machines and put the three-wing shutter on one of them. It certainly puts it all over the two-wing article and I have the advantage of watching both work side by side. Projection is improving in Toronto, but there is lots of room for advancement. I wish the World and the department every success."

Neighbor Le Feare's letter requires no comment, except to say that I am pleased to know that projection is improving in his city, and to point out the fact that the interchange of ideas through the department is proving of great value to a great number. In this instance an operator in Norfolk, Va., has helped a brother operator in Toronto through publication (page 301 February 11th issue) of a three-wing shutter he had installed on his machine. These instances of benefit through the distribution of ideas through the department could be multiplied by hundreds, and even by thousands. It is this feature that gives the department its greatest value.

Has Trouble.—Charleston, S. C., writes: "I am a constant reader of the World, especially the department, which has been of great benefit to me. It undoubtedly is a splendid thing for operators as well as theaters. I have a new machine with an outside three-wing shutter. When the speed is all right we have a beautiful, steady, flickerless picture, but as soon as the speed is increased there is a distinct flicker. We have a 60 ft. throw. Will you kindly advise us as to the source of this annoyance in the next issue of the department?"

In the first place, Charleston, you didn't sign your letter, and all letters must be signed, though not necessarily for publication. In fact, the name is never published where the writer requests that it be not. As to your shutter trouble, you will have to come across with further information. I think the difficulty lies in the fact that you are using alternating current, in which case at a certain speed (dependent upon the number of alternations per second) the blades of your shutter get in synchronism with one side of the alternations. The remedy for this is a two-wing shutter or else avoid the speed which produces the flashing in the light. I cannot tell positively, however, whether this is the case or not, since your information is so meager. Write again, stating the cycle of current, if A.C., per second, and the number of turns of crank per minute when the flicker occurs. Also please describe the "flicker" as accurately as possible.

A Few Questions.—Stafford, Kas., writes: "Will you kindly answer the following questions through the Trouble Department: (1) Should the revolving shutter of an Edison exhibition model fit up snug to the mitre gear on the main spindle, or should there be a little play? (2) Should the pin-wheel and star-wheel fit snug, or have some play? (3) How can one tighten or loosen main spindle and main shaft and yet keep them parallel? (4) Is an adjustable lens satisfactory; that is to say, does it give as sharp and clear a picture as the ordinary kind?"

(1) The revolving shutter mitre gears should fit together snugly, but not so that they bind. As long as the gears do not bind they are not too tight. However, there will be no ill effect, even should there be a little play. Naturally as the gears become worn it will be impossible to keep them tight enough to eliminate all lost motion. (2) The cam (pin-wheel) and star should not fit tight together when the machine is cold, but should have just the least little bit of play. This play, however, should be very slight, barely enough to be seen when looking at the star closely while trying it. If you fit them up tight together when the machine is cold the expansion of the metals under heat will cause undue friction. In testing the cam and star you should try the star on all four quarters of the lock, since one may be a little tighter than the other three and it is on this quarter the star should be set. (3) By "main spindle" and "main shaft" you probably have reference to the cam, or flywheel, shaft and the intermittent sprocket, or star, shaft. The cam shaft runs in bushings which keep it constantly central in one position. The intermittent sprocket or star shaft, however, rests in eccentric bushings, the turning of which has the effect of tightening the star against the cam. By the judicious use of a pair of calipers, in any convenient way which suggests itself, you can tell when you have raised one end of the shaft as much as the other. You could also make a special tool which would enable you to turn both bushings exactly the same amount. However, I think your own ingenuity will enable you to do the job without much trouble if you apply your mind to the problem. (4) I would not recommend the use of the adjustable lens. The results are fairly good, sometimes very good; but as a rule these lenses are not to be altogether depended upon for the best results.

Outside Shutter.—Mr. C. H. Thomas, Bath, N. Y., writes: "Will you kindly inform me whether or no it is possible to put an outside shutter on a Motiograph No. 1, model 1909? Will you give me some information as to the method used, or, if the above query has been answered in a previous issue, kindly advise date of publication? Do you consider that a first-class 'universal' lens is as good for any distance as one made for a particular throw? Would you advise me to get a 'universal.' I appreciate the Trouble Department very much."

Unless I am very much mistaken, Neighbor Thomas, the Enterprise Optical Company have an outside shutter attachment which can be fitted to your machine. I would suggest you address the Enterprise Optical Company, West Randolph Street, Chicago, Ill., (87 I think the number is, but without it a letter will reach them) on this subject. I am sorry to say I am unable to give you instructions for attaching an outside shutter to that machine. It is a proposition I would myself have to figure out. As to the question concerning lenses, I would refer you answer to "A Few Questions," in another part of the department. I must, however, set you right on one proposition. A lens is not made for any particular "throw," but is made to project a certain size picture at a given throw. If it projects a 15 ft. picture at 60 feet it would project a picture at 80 feet and also at 50 feet, but the one at 80 feet would be larger than the one at 60, while the one at 50 would be smaller. It would, however, be necessary to change the focus slightly as the screen is moved forward or back.

Condensers.—New York City writes: "Find enclosed $1.50 for Handbook. Also please tell me what size condensers I should use for an 8x12 picture, 65 feet, and which one should go in front. After all the argument, what was finally decided to be the best way to find the focal length of the condensers? I sometimes have trouble with my light. The spot on the cooling plate changes as per illustrations. Sometimes these three changes would take place in one or two minutes. What is wrong? I am using your way of setting my carbons; cored toped and bottom."

For an 8x12 picture, 65 feet, I should use two 7½-inch condensers, but I would, if necessary, change my condenser holder so as to get the apex of the convex sides of the condensers within 1/16th of an inch of each other, or even closer than that. If you find two 7½ do not give you just the right result, try one 6½ and one 7½, placing the 7½ next the light, preferably. As to measuring the focal length of condensing lenses, I have seen no reason to change my views on this proposition. The accurate measure of condensers is an impossibility, since the optical center of the lens lies somewhere between the two surfaces, its exact location being dependent upon the refractive index of the glass. I maintain, however, that in measuring the lens the flat side should be towards the wall, but the measurements should be taken from the optical center of the lens to the wall, which, of course, is out of the question. A measurement from the flat side to the wall would be a little less than the real focal length of the lens, while a measurement from the apex of the convex side of the lens would be a little too much, speaking now, of course, of measuring with the flat side towards the wall. In the immediate future I propose to have something on this subject and it will be a "something" covering a good many pages, probably running several weeks. As to the light, I should say that the trouble occurs when you get your carbons too close together; that is to say, burn your arc too short. I could not positively say that this is the fact, but I think if you examine your craters when that condition is present you will find them to be more or less in the shape shown at "E," Fig. 33, page 88, of the Handbook.

A Switch Scheme.—Windber, Pa., submits sketch of a switch designed to handle the projection arc, the house lights and operating room lights, all with the machine switch. In the switch shown, Windber has simply installed two sets of contacts in an ordinary enclosed, double pole single-throw machine switch such as is attached to the Powers and other machine tables. With all due respect to you, Windber, I cannot see my way clear to approve the proposition as you have set it forth. In the first place, it would not be approved, as you have it installed, by various authorities, including the International Board of Fire Underwriters. The connection amounts to a double pole, double throw switch, on one end of which is the machine and on the other end the house lights, with an extra contact for operating room lights. It would work all right, and, with an especiallly constructed, carefully made switch I can see where such an arrangement might, under certain conditions, be of distinct value.

Three-Phase Current.—Little Rock, Ark., writes: "I have got mixed up in an argument as follows: A friend of mine claims that a 3-wire alternating system is not operated by two dynamos in series, but by a single 3-phase generator. Is he right? If so, will you please explain what is meant by 3-phase current?"

Your friend is quite correct, Little Rock. The 3-wire alternating current system is not and cannot be operated with two dynamos hitched in series, as is the case with the 3-wire D C system, for the very simple reason that it would be an utter impossibility to keep the two machines in synchronism or "step," with each other. I am not certain I can make this matter of phase plain to you in a brief article in this department. In alternating current dynamos you must consider the current as being rapidly reversed, rising from nothing at all to the maximum voltage and reducing again to nothing, each alternation. That is to say, with 60-cycle 110-volt current the current arises from nothing to 110 volts and drops again to nothing 120 times per second, half of these impulses being of positive polarity and half negative. These oscillations of the current are represented in waves, the single plain alternating current being shown at "A" in which the vertical line represents voltage, the horizontal line being zero. The wave lines, a, b, over the horizontal are to be considered as two positive alternations, while the wave lines c, d, beneath the horizontal represent two negative impulses of the current, the length of the horizontal line x to z representing just one-thirtieth of a second. This illustration, understand, shows the plain alternating current. For certain reasons, however, 2 and 3 phase currents are desirable. Two and 3-phase current differ in the fact that the 2-phase system requires 4 main distribution wires, and these wires have the effect of two distinct and separate circuits through which are passing simple alternating current similar to that shown in sketch "A," these currents acting upon the armature of a motor like the two cranks on a locomotive, one being at right angle with the other; or, putting it another way, one 90 degrees in advance of the other. The 3-phase alternating system, however, requires only 3 wires; and for transmitting energy in large amounts long distances for power purposes, it is the ideal system. There is also a third 3-wire alternating system known as the monocyclic system, which is, in effect, a combination of a single phase and 3-phase systems. To enter a little more fully into the explanation of 1, 2 and 3-phase systems—in the 2-phase system shown at "B," when one of the alternations is at zero (just crossing the zero line) the other alternation is at the height of its voltage, so that the "pull" of the current is at all times constant. This means that the two currents are displaced in "phase," or reach their highest values and lowest values at opposite intervals of time. Hence, they are called 2-phase. If two alternating current generators, of like build, were coupled together by their armature shafts in such manner that when a given armature coil on one machine was directly under a field pole, the coil corresponding to it on the other machine would be half way between two poles of its field; then the two currents would be displaced by half an alternation; or, in other words, it would be a 2-phase current. If a third dynamo of similar build were connected and the three armatures connected in such manner that the corresponding coils on each one would be equally "staggered" with respect to each other and the pole pieces, then we should have 3-phase current, as is shown at "C." Now, Little Rock, I am not certain that all of this has done you or anyone else any particular good, but it is as clear an explanation of the 3-phase proposition as I am able to give you in a brief article. I trust you will, however, be able to understand what I have tried to explain—fairly well, at least. Remember that the horizontal line not only represents zero in voltage, considered up and down, but time also as regards its length. In 60-cycle current each distance x to y equals one cycle or 1/60 of a second. It, therefore, follows that from x to w would be half that or one alternation or ½ cycle or 1/120 of a second. The whole method of illustration is perfect, once it is understood thoroughly.

The science of deduction and elimination, as applied by Detective Hatfield, not only fails to solve the mysterious disappearance of Mrs. Rodwell's diamond necklace, but comes near wrecking the life of innocent Virginia, the lady's companion. Nora, the impish maid, assisted by good common sense, restores the missing jewels; uncovers and saves the real culprit (who is the sensation of this dazzling picture) and paves the way for the happiness of "two souls with but a single thought, two hearts that beat as one."

Letters to the Editor

DETROIT GAS ENGINE MAKES GOOD.

Villisca, Ia., March 19, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:—

For the purpose of giving lectures in towns where the electric current is not sufficient to project a clear picture, I bought of the Detroit Engine Works, one of their electric light producing engines, and I must say that it gives wonderful results. The engine I have is a 3 horse-power coal-oil engine, with a 60-volt generator, direct current, which weighs 430 pounds.

At the Temple Theater, Red Oak, Iowa, the lights were so uncertain that I used my outfit, which furnished power enough to burn 36 sixteen candle-power carbon lights, fifteen of which were in the auditorium, and the remainder in the ticket office, entrance and on the stage, and gave a much better light than the 70 sixteen candle-power city lights.

At my new theater, the Detroit, I run ten 4 C. P. carbon lights in front; one sixteen in the ticket office, one eight at the entrance, one eight at the center and one 8 at each exit, which run all the time while the arc is on. Twelve sixteen candle-power carbons in auditorium which are off when arc is on. We pull 52 to 55 volts when arc is on and get fine pictures. We have only missed one night, and that was on account of batteries. It costs me ninety-five cents per week for coal-oil, and we run from 7 until 10 o'clock. Two shows a night, each containing three reels. Sometimes I give two reels over. I play the piano, and between reels I see that the coal-oil feed is all right. That is all the attention this outfit gets from me.

I would advise anyone who is getting a stationary engine to purchase a 6 H. P. engine, with 60-volt direct current generator, 2½ K. W., and it will give the desired juice. You can double the amount of light by using Tungsten 20-watt lamps.

For a dandy outfit, get Detroit double-cylinder engine and 6 K. W. direct current generator, and you can run fans and any number of lights at a very small cost.

I have had five months' experience with this outfit, and am next to the troubles. Would be glad to help anyone with a Detroit engine, if they have trouble.

I am a constant reader of your paper, and positively cannot do without it.

Yours very truly,
DR. F. M. CHILDS

TOO MUCH GUM-SUCKING.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir:—With all this valued talk of progress I would fain drop in my little oar and implore the makers of pictures, in Heaven's name, to get next to themselves and cut out this everlasting osculation, catch-as-catch-can, 200-foot-long-soul-kiss-embraces which spoil about one-half of the best dramatic subjects at the present time. I don't blame the leading men for taking advantage of their opportunities; in fact, it may be that I am just plain jealous, but nevertheless it's down-right mean the way they rub it in, just because they have a chance.

In all seriousness, however, this kissing business is much overdone. Many an otherwise artistic performance is spoiled, made commonplace and cheapened. It is not particularly elevating for young ladies to see our ideas of a young man exceptionally high ideals of the fair sex. And, like many another feature, can well be left to the imagination of the audience. Popular songs and song slides supply about all the ordinary program needs of this affectionate feature. I for one am getting tired of blushing for such unblushing osculatory exhibitions.

Wishing you and the Moving Picture World the best of success in elevating the picture play and thanking you for the many valuable suggestions received from its pages,

I am very truly yours,
JAS. C. RATHBONE.

Ironwood, Mich., March 15, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir:—As an old subscriber to your paper and as an old exhibitor I wish to commend the stand you are taking toward an open market.

As an operator I worked—North, South, East and West and my experience was then that the average moving picture show manager had about as much intelligence as an oyster, but now, after several years, in the show vernacular they are getting "wised up" and it is high time they started to put the business on the footing they want it, and the only way that will ever be accomplished is for them to organize a national association and to have a board of censors "elected by popular vote," men that are not in the business and are exhibitors, and to have them pass on all makes of film and select the best each week. That will put an end to trusts and other organizations that have arisen to regard the exhibitor as legitimate prey.

What a joke it is when we stop to think of the way we got things handed to us—we, the men who risk our all in bringing good amusement, education and enlightenment into out-of-the-way places of the world, and then to be dictated to by a favored few who, shown in their hearts, give us credit for being nothing but fools.

In closing my remarks I wish to add that in my opinion the entire moving picture business owes a never-ending debt of gratitude to the men who have always had the best interests of the business at heart—the editors of the Moving Picture World.

Trusting I may have the pleasure of meeting you at the convention, I am Yours Resp.

J. S. C. WANTS INFORMATION.

New York, March 22, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—I am a reader of the World and it seems to me as though the moving picture business is one in which there are a great many different positions and consequent opportunities to advance in a profitable and interesting business.

Will some reader, who knows, tell me through the World if this is a good business for a young man to learn. J. S. C.

[If J. S. C. will call or write and state his qualifications, we may be able to find him a position in what is, indeed, a "good business." We have been the means of placing many who are now making their mark in the field.—Ed. M. P. W.]

FROM A PROGRESSIVE EXHIBITOR.

Bellefontaine, Ohio, March 20, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—Enclosed find renewal of my subscription to the Moving Picture World. I read every word in the World, and I am especially interested in the Operators' and Managers' column, and also the Comments on the Films. I depend a great deal on the comments for selection of programme and advertising purposes, and I am very much disappointed when I get a picture that has not been reviewed.

I dislike very much some articles that I have read in a house organ, slurring Mr. Richardson, and also the Taylor School. While Mr. Richardson may not be infallible, I have derived a wonderful benefit from his writings in the Moving Picture World.

Regarding the Taylor School: I am taking their correspondence course, and, while they are pretty slow in sending the instructions, I have been benefited very much by what I have already received. You will see by my letterhead that good projection is our hobby and the best of music our aim; and so far as results go, I have to turn people away in spite of strong opposition.

If there is any fault I can find with the trade papers it is that, on a few occasions, the editors have indulged too freely in personalities. I know it is hard to keep quiet when the other fellow is knocking, but the majority of your readers care nothing for his kind of dope.

With best wishes for the success of the World I am,

Yours for high class entertainments.

F. E. RUTTER, Manager The Royal Theater.

REELS SHOULD BE INSPECTED AT FACTORY.

New York, March 10, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Gentlemen:—What independent producer has a uniform photographic quality? Biograph, Vitagraph, Edison, Essanay and Lubin, all have their photographic standards, and the products are nearly always of uniform quality. The independents, however, seem of the opinion that good photography does not count, as long as cowboys and Indians are in evidence. "The Last Laugh," a Reliance, for instance, had some poorly exposed exteriors which spoiled the whole reel. The titles "crawled" so badly that it was almost impossible for the operator to keep them in frame long enough to be read. This shows plainly that the reel had not been projected before leaving the factory. The writer is inspector of reels at an independent exchange, and realizes the importance of carefully examining them before distribution. It is not fair to exchanges and exhibitors to have to accept these half-good and half-bad reels. Just as soon as a producer makes a reputation then down goes the quality, instead of keeping up the good work. H. LYMAN BROENING.

A PLEA FOR AN OPEN MARKET.

Anaconda, Mont., March 14, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—The conflicting stories circulated in regard to the various concerns interested in this business certainly keeps one guessing as to the outcome of the game. I hope some day to enter the manufacturing field through the advertising and the educational ends of the game. In other words apply motion pictures to the same use that the kodak and other cameras are now used for. Having a thorough, practical knowledge of photography in all its branches, I feel that I would make good provided I could cater to an open market.

I agree with the writer of the articles in the issues of February 25th and March 11th that if we do not have an open market, it will mean the death of motion pictures within a few years. I want to see the time when the motion picture will be sold and exhibited on its merits. True, the Patents Company, licensees, are turning out some very good pictures, also some of the Sales Company members, but there are other men that could and would turn out pictures that would excel even the best products these two factions are turning out, if it were not for the tactics employed to keep the truly independent manufacturer out of the field.

In conclusion I want to thank the Moving Picture World for its many favors to me and assure you that I shall always recommend it whenever possible, although I do not think it needs any boosting, as it speaks for itself. I am,

Yours very truly, W. C. BACH.

"KEEP AFTER 'EM."

Winona, Minn., March 24, 1911.

The Moving Picture World.

Gentlemen:—As one of your regular readers, permit me to say that I greatly appreciate the absolutely independent position you occupy with your publication.

We are glad to see you "put the knife in" wherever it is needed. To read a few copies of "The Film Index," one would think the "trust film" was never made that ever contained a weak plot or an inconsistent situation. On the other hand, it is refreshing to see you "hand it" to the independent releases that are so wretchedly poor in photography and contain so little attention to even the simplest details. Keep after 'em; that's your "life work."

Why is it that practically every issue of the "Imp" films, for instance, are so "chalky" and lack the tone values of good photography? I have watched many an "Imp" and am beginning to think their printers care little for quality. If they did I am sure they would keep at least some details in their shadows, equalize their tone values more and incidentally print a rock steady positive. Other independents are now doing it, but I note, with regret, that most of these are of foreign make. Sincerely,

BENJ. HUNTLEY.

PATHOS.

Sutton, Neb., March 22, 1911.

Publishers Moving Picture World.

Dear Sirs:—Please cut me off your list. I am out of business, "pinched out" by the Patents Co. When I got in "a short row of stumps" the Sales Company wouldn't do a thing for me to help out. The others are a cold proposition and their professions are 101 per cent wind.

Truly yours,

DR. M. V. CLARK.

"Who Gets the Order" (Edison).—A lively and laughable comedy purporting to depict the adventures of two ambitious salesmen after the same order. Broken locomotives, unruly automobiles, unmanageable bicycles and slow wagons all play their part in the drama of business. Eventually they both reach the goal at the same moment, the order is divided between them and the film ends with everybody happy.

"A Sawmill Hero" (Kalem).—A melo-drama picturing activities in the lumber camps. A young man, too indifferent to do his work in college through a succession of events becomes a sawmill hero and discovers to his surprise that the owner is his father. A little love tale is interwoven among the other exciting events. The scenery in and about the lumber camp is good and affords a reasonably accurate impression of how it actually looks.

"The Cattle Rustlers" (Pathe).—A Western picture built largely upon the same basis as others of this character. A love story is included, but the picture offers no striking variation from many others which have preceded it.

"The Money Lender" (Urban).—Another roast upon lenders of money, intimating that as a class they are heartless and cruel, taking undue advantage of the simple fisher folk forced by circumstances to borrow from them. A haunting vision drives this one to distraction and he falls from a cliff to his death in the sea. The picture has little to commend it except the excellent outdoor photography.

"Nemours, and the Banks of the River Loing, France" (Urban).—A series of interesting views along this picturesque stream. Like all of Urban's outdoor work the photography in this needs no praise. It speaks for itself.

"The Lonedale Operator" (Biograph).—A story that carries the audience with a rush and a whirl. It moves swiftly through the scenes that makes the audience sit with bated breath until it is over. The distinctive feature is a girl holding the robbers at bay with a nickel-plated wrench that looks like a pistol. This scene is the most important and is managed with skill. The rush of the locomotive is exciting as it flies over the rails bearing assistance to the girl. The fact that the engineer's part is played by an actor who is an engineer insures accuracy of detail in handling the huge machine. But such scenes have been enacted before. It is a novelty to see two men at bay before a wrench. The actress who performs this feat so acceptably deserves credit for her work.

"Bridget and the Egg" (Lubin).—A comedy detailing Bridget's experience with a china egg which naughty Willie brought her. The breaking of the real egg with an axe is an absurd, but funny act, and what Willie got when he was discovered will make almost any audience laugh.

"The Spinster's Legacy" (Lubin).—A comedy, which is at the same time a shrewd character study. To see the loungers around an old-fashioned grocery store so acceptably reproduced is sufficient to attract, and the way they go to see Priscilla when she acquires wealth is amusing, but is strangely in accordance with facts. But Si, whose affection was not concerned with the dollars and cents, was the lucky fellow. He got the girl and the money, too.

"Sir Percy and the Punchers" (Melies).—A Western picture which is intended to illustrate the characteristics of the cowboy. Probably Sir Percy gets what any bunch of cowboys would give him under similar conditions, but it must be remembered in looking at pictures like this that in effect it is the same as reading a story. The girl's part is played with life and animation, and the final scene where Sir Percy runs the gauntlet will please those who like Western pictures of this type.

"The Way of the Transgressor" (Selig).—The story of wrong and desertion, with a wife and child left to suffer the consequences of a man's ill-doing. Afterward the man's punishment comes, while the woman and child are made happy. The picture is a sermon upon the results of evil-doing and as such should be judged upon its merits as an illustration of the oft-repeated assertion that the transgressor will be duly punished. Perhaps it is unwise in considering a film of this kind to think how many transgressors, even of the type represented here, escape, or seem to escape, the results of their wrong doing. If the film is accepted as it is with no consideration of actual facts, it is a good story and is well enough acted to enforce the moral evidently intended.

"The Disreputable Mr. Reagan" (Edison).—A story of the East Side of New York by Richard Harding Davis satisfactorily interpreted by the Edison players. Perhaps its chief interest lies in the East Side realism which finds graphic expression in the tumble down tenements, the robbery in the saloon and the chase by the police. The little girl and her big protector are not impossible characters, yet such instances are extremely rare in that haunt of sorrow and hunger. This gives the picture a human touch which adds to its interest and assists in the dramatic interpretation of a life little known outside of New York. The audience expresses its approval of the result in Reagan's case. The Sunday school idea of reform is gratified when it is made plain that he decides to turn over a new leaf, as the saying goes, and care for the little waif whom fate thus placed in his way.

"Rescued from the Desert" (Kalem).—A melodramatic picture made on the desert in Arizona and accurate so far as scenery is concerned. The story told is not altogether pleasing, yet possibly such instances have occurred in years past. To send a man into the desert is a sentence which is equivalent to lynching, only less humane. The part the Indian plays may represent the better side of an Indian's nature, yet it is to be feared that it is largely a novelist's conception. Poets have ascribed qualities to Indians that those familiar with them deny, yet motion picture people have persistently emphasized these denied qualities. The Kalem pictures, judged from the standard of the class of literature to which they belong are interesting, but they are not to be compared with those which interpret higher forms.

"The Lieutenant's Love" (Pathe).—A story of love which concerned two men in the German army and ends with disappointment for the unfortunate girl, who discovers the man she wants can never marry her because of the difference in rank of her father and his. In a vague sort of way these differences are known to the people of this country, but a film like this is not clearly understood by a majority of the average audience because these subtle distinctions of rank are not known here and therefore the troubles based upon them are meaningless. As a love story and an exhibition of uniforms this picture is interesting. Further than that it will scarcely be understood in America.

"The Widow Visits Sprigtown" (Vitagraph).—A comedy illustrating the adventures of a stunning widow whose make-up is a dream, but whose every charm is artificial. Jealous maidens plan an exposure, but are thwarted in their nefarious scheme and the widow disappears with her ancient admirer and rescuer, leaving a lock of her false hair for each of the young men as a memento of her brilliant visit. Played with the snap and vigor which are characteristic qualities of the Vitagraph players this picture should be popular.

"A Thwarted Vengeance" (Essanay).—A highly sensational film, depicting wild Western scenes with a degree of realism that is not altogether pleasant, but fascinating. A girl is kidnapped, and trussed up to a tree in front of her lover's cabin, while the kidnapper goes in and finds the lover with the intention of murdering him. In this he is thwarted and is afterward shot dead by the girl's lover. This is all sensational enough, but is saved from the usual disagreeable sense of grotesqueness by the artistic settings. Usually such films are more or less disagreeable, but in this instance the acting is its saving grace and the audience plainly expresses its approval.

"Cupid's Conquest" (Gaumont).—A love story representing a father objecting to a wedding, but when a statue of Cupid comes to life and argues the matter with him, by showing him in reminiscence some of the scenes from his own younger days, he relents. The picture has many pretty scenes which add to its attractiveness.

"People of the Arabian Desert" (Gaumont).—A travelogue presenting interesting views of the desert and its people. There is a bey with his suite, a funeral and other phases of life which are interesting.

"The Kid from Arizona" (Pathe).—An improbable Western picture, representing the remarkable prowess of a kid who fights and wins over Western bullies. Such stories always please. There is a feeling of exultation when a small, or weak man, overcomes one larger and stronger than himself. And, even though the story told is improbable, everyone who sees the picture will enjoy it and be ready to applaud the kid.

"Little Lad in Dixie" (Vitagraph).—A sermon on the horrors of war which should be included in the peace propaganda. The little boy is manly and fights for what he believes is right, laying down his life in the defense of what he believes to be his country. Then comes the wild ride of his mother and her grief when she finds him dead. It is war from another viewpoint, equally as horrible as those presented heretofore. Good mechanical work has helped materially in the production of this film.

"Priscilla's April Fool Joke" (Biograph).—A comedy presenting amusing scenes without the introduction of slapstick methods. It is acted with the care which characterizes most of the work of the Biograph players and makes a favorable impression upon the audience. Priscilla's rage when she discovers another girl in her place is a good bit of work, and the frenzy of the company when they find the wraps on the shore, pointing to suicide, is good enough to be humorous.

"Cured" (Biograph).—A slapstick comedy introducing an old gentleman afflicted with the gout, whose wheel chair is stolen by a tramp and all sorts of capers are cut. Then the gouty gent gets the trouncing that was due the tramp.

"Her Child's Honor" (Lubin).—The interest in this picture increases in intensity as it runs, to the climax which comes with the second marriage with the doctor, and the death which follows immediately. It is an interesting complication, developing dramatic situations not commonly seen in photoplays. The duel, in which the man and woman are mortally wounded, is properly suppressed. The results are sufficient. The death of the man first, allowing the woman to marry again with her last breath, insuring her child's honor, is a fitting close to a picture altogether out of the ordinary. The acting is upon a high plane and the photography is clear.

"Love in Madrid" (Pathe).—A love story of no particular strength, introducing characters that fall in love and arrange for a marriage with an abandon and speed that are altogether astonishing. A duel over the girl enlivens the picture somewhat. The settings are somewhat interesting since they probably reproduce characteristic scenes in Madrid, or, at least, in a Spanish town.

"Her Adopted Fathers" (Selig).—Beginning in a shipwreck the picture depicts the life history of a girl adopted by kindhearted fishermen, marries an artist, but shortly finds her way back to the old men never to leave them again. Why are artists so often made the scapegoats in pictures of this sort? They are no more untrue or cruel than other men and scarcely deserve the condemnation they get.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Fakir's New Servant" (Great Northern).—An interesting trick picture, representing a magician performing all sorts of strange stunts, some of them clever, indeed. But when his servant undertakes the same things he gets into enough trouble to keep the audience busy laughing until the picture ends.

"Troubles of a Trip" (Great Northern).—A lively comedy, showing the difficulties that arose to prevent Jones from having as good a time upon his trip to the city as he expected. Mrs. Jones makes it very plain that she objects, and in this objection, which is vigorously interposed as he is beginning to enjoy himself with his hilarious friends, lies the fun of the picture.

"Toto Wants to Get Thinner" (Itala).—A lively comedy presenting in humorous fashion Toto's frantic attempts to reduce his flesh. The ways he adopts will supply suggestions for almost any anti-fat campaign desired.

"Ogallalah" (Powers).—An Indian picture which seems to illustrate the Indian characteristics as they are commonly understood. The relentless pursuit of the kidnapper by the Indian, the long shot with his bow and the final vengeance are accurate in their delineation of Indian character. There is no mawkish sentimentality here. It is savage and cruel, as Indians are by nature. It is somewhat disagreeable, but its strength cannot be denied.

"Hurrah! Hurrah! Let Us Marry" (Eclair).—A comedy depicting how two old people were cleverly tricked into allowing their son and daughter to marry, and as a climax decide to marry themselves. A lively little play, with sufficient bright incidents to keep the audience interested.

"Sweet Memories" (Imp).—A delicately planned picture, showing, as in a vision a mother's past life. Most of the incidents will appeal to the average person in the audience as a repetition of his own. Most girls have duels, but the homely scenes are reproductions of what befall most men and women in life.

"Tom and Jerry" (Yankee).—The story of a man whose reason deserted him through a combination of difficulties, and was restored through a visit to his daughter's home. The story is clearly told and there is sufficient pathos in it to develop a strong heart interest.

"The Talesman" (American).—A dramatic tale offering some unusual situations and telling a story which is clear and satisfactorily interpreted. The audience followed it closely and though they did not applaud they were visibly pleased with it.

"The Truth" (Nestor).—A good picture with a number of strikingly impressive scenes, photographed, staged and acted after the high standard for which the Nestor product is noted. The story is not a thriller, but it is well punctuated with fine dramatic moments.

"The Pay Roll" (Champion).—A Western picture with a hold-up, a lively battle with the bandits in which a woman is killed, then years after the man kidnaps a girl and carries her away to his cabin where she is shown to be his own daughter. That's a long list of exciting incidents, none of them improbable and all admirably worked out. As has been pointed out before in these columns kidnapping women is so much a thing of the past that it is scarcely advisable in motion pictures, and fortunately few producers utilize an incident like this. Maybe it is justifiable in this instance because of the novel situation when the denouement comes in the cabin. The film gets its name from the fact that bandits rob a paymaster on his way to a ranch to pay off the men. The film has much of merit in it, with plenty of thrilling action and a touch of pathos at the close when the girl leaves the cabin of her real father, where she was held a prisoner, to go with her foster father.

"Could You Blame Him?" (Nestor).—A lively comedy, graphically depicting the experience of a young husband when he attempts to deceive a wealthy uncle regarding his marriage. The wife and a friend induced to pose as her husband make life miserable for the young man. Then, when the uncle discovers the deception, there is consternation indeed. There are plenty of interesting and laughable situations and the audience extracts a liberal share of amusement from the picture. The photography is of the quality always offered by the Nestor people.

"Tweedledum's April Fool Joke" (Ambrosio).—Here is this favorite fun-maker in another interesting and altogether amusing complication in honor of April Fool's day. As usual in such cases made and provided, the working out of the comedy affords liberal opportunity for concatenation.

"Cupid's Victory" (Solax).—A rather lively love story based upon a marital mix-up that threatened a voyage on stormy seas, but turned into smooth sailing under the machinations of Cupid. Everybody married whom he or she wanted eventually, though at first it looked like a long series of disappointments. The photography is good and the audience seemed interested from beginning to end.

"When the Red Turned Gray" (Reliance).—A well executed trick picture, purporting to represent the experiences of a man who imbibed too freely. The things he sees are as strange as the wildest dreams of fancy. Only cracked ice brings relief. Some of the disappearances are well managed and add much to the interest in the film.

"The Harem Skirt" (American).—Here is a funny one that will set your audience to laughing. It is based upon the much discussed skirt which is really a pair of trousers and which has almost created riots wherever a woman wearing one has appeared in public. It ought to perform the same operation in your theater. The idea is well developed and the acting, which is a string of experiences, is sufficiently in harmony with the subject to keep up the delusion.

"Five Hours" (Rex).—A picture based upon a bet that it is comparatively easy to enter a house and steal something. The actor who plays the leading role is clever and performs his part well. The complication with the girl adds interest, as does what comes afterward. That the man wins the bet is assured. The picture was made for that purpose. It is a good story, well told, with plenty of action and a novel basis. These combine to make a good film.

"The Penniless Prince" (Imp.)—A melo-dramatic story of a German prince, penniless as most princes are, and the love of a Cuban planter's daughter. The feature is the sacrifice of the girl's lover to obtain money for the prince, though it is not plain just why this was necessary. Then the prince falls heir to vast estates and marries the girl. The scenery is a marked feature of the film, and the story moves forward with a swing that carries the audience with it almost irresistibly. The outdoor photography is excellent.

"Edith has Some Sport" (Lux).—A lively story, ending with a somewhat boisterous chase; yet, withal, a pleasing enough picture of its kind. Some of the peculiar things that happen to Edith while she is shooting suggest humorous possibilities when using a gun. Ultimately, however, her riotous method of shooting at everything she sees brings her to grief and her father is called upon to settle. The audience has been well entertained during the running of the film.

"Out of the Depths" (Solax).—A pleasant story of a young man's success in overcoming obstacles and making himself of so much account that his past is overlooked. There is little in it that can be called dramatic, but the story is well told and the young man's effort to make his way upward is happily rewarded in the end. The cruel stepfather receives his deserts, which seems to increase the interest of the picture and the scene in which the young man is wounded defending the banker is well managed and thrilling. In some ways it is rather an impossible story, yet none the less interesting for that reason.

"The Tramp" (Thanhouser).—One feature in this picture will interest as a novelty. Instead of causing the tramp to reform mand become a leading village light they show him listening to the call of the road and send him again upon his way. This makes the picture notable. It changes the conventional ending for such pictures and creates a new impression as the tramp steals away to escape being rewarded for his excellences of conduct. Otherwise the film tells a good story and represents an ordinary tramp doing what many ordinary tramps have done heretofore. The finale is the best part of the story and causes the one who sees it to want to see more.

"Love's Ebb and Flood" (Yankee).—A story of cruelty, of love and a marital mixup which holds the attention of the audience to the denouement which brings things out pleasantly for all excepting the villain. He is sent over a cliff to his death, and his demise makes two hearts happy since it permits his wife to marry the man who has been importuning her for a year. It is difficult to describe such a picture and any criticism which may be made upon it will probably not be concurred in by many who see it. Perhaps it is sufficient to say that the parts are well acted and that the wife exhibits satisfying emotion when her lover persists in his requests for her to marry him. The picture suggests the thought that human lives are often actually thus mixed and men and women grope blindly along, much as they do here, working out their own fate in ways that they themselves do not know.

EDISON.

APRIL FOOL.—The story begins with the waking up of the little heroine by her sister out of a sweet, who comes in on her nightie and gives throwing a pillow at her, calls her sleepyhead, he an goodnight and tells her best out. Of course when she looks and finds it nothing to be sure. Sincere and April Fools day has started.

Then we see two very youthful young on their way to school. The boy stops at the store and carries her books for her and when he reaches corner, taking from his pocket a small bag of candy, he offers it to her. She takes a large piece and a large bite of the large piece and then finds that the candy is loaded with vinegar, of course she proceeds to get even by puncturing holes in an apple and filling the holes with pepper, but the young man is too smart for her. So he substitutes an apple of his own and apparently eats the peppered one with great gusto. Then shifting again, he tempts her the peppered apple and she in caught at her own trick.

Of course this is too much for the young lady and she goes home alone, refusing to see him and shutting him out of the front door when he follows her on to the front porch. Being something of a diplomat, the young man procures another partner to go to school with him, and our little heroine sees her best male paying attentions to another girl. When he gives her a piece of cake and accepts a honeymoon banquet, the climax of jealousy is reached.

After school, on the way home, the young lady drops her belt into a puddle of water and not wanting to soil her hands, tries to fish it out with a stick. Our small hero comes along and offers his assistance, which is scornfully refused at first, the reason being given that he is wearing a buttonhole bouquet of another young lady. He gallantly tears this off and flings it to the ground and offers his services again. This time they are accepted.

Then he decides that he will not get the belt without a kiss. Sitting on an old stile the two youngsters play for this kiss, the girl holding off and the small boy following her. Suddenly they realize that an April shower is coming. The young man runs down the steps of the stile and opens up the umbrella which he has carried. Now the rain begins to pour down in earnest and the little lady asks him to put the umbrella over her, but he still holds off until she gives him the promised kiss. Meantime they are both getting drenched to the skin in a regulation thunder shower, which finally forces the young lady to accede and the kiss is given.

BETWEEN TWO FIRES.—In order to save the life of her uncle, who has been taken prisoner by the Prussians, Miriam de Leyden is ordered to forward to the German general the plans of the Bremen grant, which her eighteen overlooks. The inhabitants of the district are ordered to move out of the firing zone, and Miriam realizes that she will not be able to draw the plans and thus save her uncle if she vacates her present quarters. Hiding them in a pail, she offers the contract as a hospital to the French commissioner, knowing that she will be safe under the protection of the Red Cross flag. She obtains the consent and hoists the flag upon the turret of the chateau.

On the commander's staff are several young officers, one of whom, Captain Legard, sees in Miriam the kind of a girl he dreams of and falls desperately in admiration for her. His devotion is not returned by Miriam, who notices that the officers young Frenchmen are their attentions and friendship soon ripens into love. The admiration of Legard for Miriam is noticed by his friend and another officer, Captain Brossault, who, suspecting her of ulterior motives decides to keep a close watch upon her movements.

As Miriam's ruse for Legard grows stronger her opposition to an open declaration of love grows, and another appeal from her uncle in which his life seems to be in save her stirs the most intense anxiety in her heart. She listens to the terror of the cannon and draws a rough outline of the French position. Captain Brossault sees and bursts upon her, seizing from a distance as he may keep the plans. Legard turns upon the commander and through his hold guarded on each Miriam throwing the paper. Declaring that there is no time to lose, he starts for the ramparts. After a short fight he gets Miriam, rushing her way through the lines of the enemy. Just as she meets the messenger who is to escort her to the Prussian camp, Brossault confronts them and makes both prisoners.

Not wishing to humiliate his friend Legard by betraying his sweetheart before a contemptible, he sends for the commander and tells him that Miriam has to be shooting. Upon the arrival of Legard and the commander, he explains the entire situation. Legard is overcome by what he thinks is his sweetheart's treachery but the commander takes another view of the matter and persuades Legard of being Miriam's accomplice. Miriam, seeing her lover in danger of losing his wife and honor, makes a clean breast of everything and explains that the plans to the commander who, when Brossault worries for the loss of the plans, burns the plans and releases Legard from arrest. Miriam begs her lover's forgiveness, which he readily grants and the lovers are happily reunited.

Jim, finding the pretty little child on his return from work, decides to keep her.

Twelve years later Jim and Virginia meet Tom, a newspaper. Jim and Tom become partners and make a lucky strike. Jim, who has followed Tom elides the latter scourge upon the basement girl in sending her to the store for a bottle of hard drink and has been used to it herself. Her husband, he so miserable for the girl, and still the girl knew herself an old flame, also a cad and a scoundrel as a rule and a bounder in particular. Then she remembered a bracelet which James had given her, and, finding herself penniless, she pawned it and sent the money to James. He received a second message to the effect that she was in prison, and he went to her rescue. Marguerite Marsh, as Lucy, gives the character a most delightful touch of humanity. She conveys the impression of a girl who is not bad at heart, but who has been led astray by the force of circumstances. Her pantomime is excellent. Miss Marsh is a most capable actress, and her work in this picture is deserving of the highest praise. Edith Storey, as Mrs. Bruce, is very good. Harry Benham, as James, is satisfactory. Frank Bennett, as Mr. Bruce, is very good. The remainder of the cast is adequate. The photography is clear. The scenes are well selected. The settings are appropriate. The direction is good. The picture is a most interesting one.

BISON.

AN INDIAN NEMESIS.—Bison has secured a great achievement in this picture. Rather, we should say, Frank Montgomery and his staff have secured the Indians in the scene. Miss Maggie A. McCullough is to be congratulated upon having written for such able material. Indeed, the story is so well told by Montgomery and Miss McCullough that it would be difficult to find any fault with it. The scenes are well selected, reminding Mexico, Arizona, or some other locality where the Indians abound. Miss Mary Anderson plays the part of Mona Moore, the daughter of the ranch owner, and Miss Anderson plays the part to perfection. She is a most capable actress, and her work in this picture is deserving of the highest praise. Miss Anderson is supported by a most capable company of players. Joe Knight, as Jack Hawkins, is very good. Jack Richardson, as Black Eagle, the Indian chief, is very good. Jack Richardson is a most capable actor, and his work in this picture is deserving of the highest praise. Jack Richardson is supported by a most capable company of players. The scenes are well selected, reminding Mexico, Arizona, or some other locality where the Indians abound. The photography is clear. The scenes are well selected. The settings are appropriate. The direction is good. The picture is a most interesting one.

THE RED AVENGER.—Bison has a most clever story with its Western setting. The scenes are most beautiful. The photography is clear. The scenes are well selected. The settings are appropriate. The direction is good. The picture is a most interesting one.

RELIANCE.

TILL DEATH DO PART.—Smith, a waiter in a fashionable restaurant, as a customer, a guest, someone disturbed by the nonchalance of his fair companion whom he was slightly offended, departs. Without a full of wine from the guest on his cheek. Smith immediately takes the money in his pocket, and it when the guest engaged in conversation with the maid. The maid waiter searches him, finds no money, returns it to the owner, and discharges Smith. The latter leaves the cafe and goes to his wife, who is waiting for him with their little child in an atmosphere of poverty, owing to the fact that Smith's petty defalcation has caused his employment. Mrs. Smith, with the baby in her arms, pleads to the restaurant proprietor that her husband might be given another chance, but he refuses. A wealthy patron, Mr. Randall, and his companion greeted with a shrug from John, and the rich woman's sympathies are aroused. She persuades the proprietor to intercede for Mrs. Smith, and the head waiter reluctantly gives the waiter his position again. Some days later, Mr. Randall loses a pearl necklace in the restaurant and Smith finds it, and burrows home, intending to keep it. He is suspected, however, and arrested, the jewels being recovered. Randall is exasperated and determines to prosecute Smith, and Mrs. Randall employs Mrs. Smith as her maid, to give her a home. The day of the trial Mrs. Smith, with the baby in her arms, rushes into court and pleads with the Randalls to drop the charge. Randall, deeply affected, persuades her husband to do so, and Smith walks out free. Smith goes to the Randall home to get his wife's clothes. Left alone in the dining, he sees a jewel case on the table, steals a pair of earrings and is caught in the act by Randall. Smith is ordered out, and departs like a skulking dog, accompanied by his faithful wife with the infant in her arms—a martyr to love and duty and the bonds which bind her to the miserable specimen of manhood at her side, "till death do part."

RICHSHAW, THE DETECTIVE.—Poor old Rickshaw is a much hen-pecked man. To evade the housework, she compels him to do he makes application for a position as detective, and to his surprise receives the appointment. Reporting at the police station he is assigned on a jewel robbery, and with marvelous ease captures a couple of desperate men. A call for help comes from a wealthy man's mansion, and Rickshaw rushes to the scene in time to make prisoners of an entire band which is locating the family and robbing the house. Rickshaw returns proudly home and is met by his masculine wife, who takes his star and gun from him, bedecks him with a gingham apron and puts him at work sweeping and cleaning.

SUMMER WIDOWS.—Jasper engages vacation board in town and when he arrives at the house discovers a score of pretty girls boarding for masculine company. Jasper is much smitten with Gemma, a big eyed auburn haired, dimpled maid, but is unable to see his fair charms alone for even a moment, as the other girls seemingly themselves about him. In desperation he writes to a friend, a popular actor, to visit him for a few weeks, hoping the girls will transfer their affections to the matinee idol. And they do! But the fun begins when Jasper throws off the mustache and goes and kisses him, for it develops that she is his wife. Jasper leaves the hotel in disgust, his exit being marked by frigid expressions from the girls.

IF IT WERE EVER THUS.—Rose, a talented Hungarian violinist, cruelly neglects his young wife, and she is compelled to apply to a musician for assistance. The patroness of the musician is a Mrs. Huntington, a wealthy young woman who gives a musicale at her home, at which Rose is engaged to play. She is enraptured with his playing, and he ingratiates himself into her good graces, leaving as a result of which Mrs. Huntington becomes enamored of the violinist. When he tells his wife he intends to divorce her she vehemently declines to acquiesce, and in a rage he attacks her. She flees for her life and takes refuge in the mission just as Mrs. Huntington happens to be visiting the institution. Hearing the story and the woman's name she accompanies the wronged wife back to her home and confronts Rose. She makes an appeal, even claiming that the woman is not his wife. His cowardly nature asserts itself however, when he loses his temper and attempts to strike her, and Mrs. Huntington, filled with revulsion, stasps his hand and chips him full in the face. Then pulling her arm about the ill-clad form of the terrified wife, she takes her home with her.

LUX.

BILL'S LITTLE PLAN.—Bill falls in love with a colonel's wife, who, accompanied by her husband, is walking down the street. Instantly Bill follows, and watches them disappear into their house. The colonel has to leave for his military duties and hardly has he gone when a lanky private appears on the scene with a message. Now Bill is on the watch and accosts the youth, learns that he has been sent to wait upon the colonel, and taking him into a cafe, bribes the private to change clothes. Leaving the soldier with strict instructions to remain until he comes back, Bill sets off for his charmer's home. But, after all, it is love's labor lost, for hardly has he got inside the house when the colonel unexpectedly returns, and he flees to the maid. Meanwhile, poor Tomkins, tired of waiting, makes his way to the colonel and hastily dresses. The whole blame pops on Bill. At that moment the maid dies in and announces the destruction of the kitchen, and the colonel, in a towering rage, sends Bill is hauled out of the wreckage and flung out of the open window, where he alights upon a manure cart. Finally, he is allowed to go, and is commended by the driver for being there at all.

A DESPERADO.—Black Jake is the terror of Injun Gulch. Everybody is afraid of him. "Half Moon" screams. Entering in his usual manner, he is greeted by the cowering crowd of men, who are more or less afraid of him. Here he insults a prospector named Hutchman, who is sitting at a table with his little daughter, and an open quarrel is only prevented by the other men. Later Hutchman is working on his claim, while Jane, the little girl, is preparing a meal when Black Jake takes up, unseeming, he walks up, and kicks over the iron pot in which Hutchman's dinner is cooking. Seeing this Hutchman makes as if to strike when Jake fires and the prospector rolls over. Little Jane falls on her knees by her father's side, while the murderer rides off. The shot has brought the Indian and his squaw on the scene, and hastily the little girl tells them of what has occurred. Quickly the sheriff is informed, a posse is made for the desperado's trail. But Jake has had a good start, and arriving at his hut, barricades the door and the windows, and prepares to fight. As the sheriff and one of the prospectors appear Jake fires and the prospector falls dead. Hastily the sheriff leaves, and informs the rest of the camp, who advance on the hut in a body. But two more of their number are killed and the attacking party are forced to withdraw. Meantime, Jane and the Indians have arrived on the scene, and hearing the news, the child slips off. Jake has come out of his cabin just as the little girl comes up. He gazes at her for a moment, and then drops his gun. That is his undoing, for the Indian promptly lassoes him and later justice is meted out to him.

CARL FISCHER COOPER SQUARE NEW YORK

AMERICAN.

THE TALISMAN.—John Gent wears the hungry, discouraged look of the unsuccessful. John takes a canvas and goes forth to dispose of it.

The miserly old dealer in the art shop hesitates about accepting John's picture, but after a promise of a 30 per cent commission he strikes it away in an obscure corner. He calls on his sweetheart to seek consolation, but that young lady, struggling for existence on the seventy dollars she receives each week at the ribbon counter, is practical, and she shows her artistic lover how absurd it would be for them to marry without sufficient means for support. The ever present camel landlord demands rent of John. John threatens to end the struggle. He writes a farewell note to his sweetheart, and goes forth to die.

His artistic taste leads him to the beautiful Lincoln Park, where he meets Winchell Jones. He is attracted by the serious aspect of the man. Realizing that something unusual is astir, he follows the young artist up the steps of the bridge. As he reaches the top Winchell reaches the edge and pulls him back to the bridge. Winchell soothes him with a slap on the back and an encouraging word. Winchell tells John that he has a talisman to call the next morning. At the appointed time John arrives, and Winchell hands him a small sealed box with a note of instructions:

"This talisman will bring you luck for one year, or—sue."

John is superstitious enough to take the talisman seriously, and he goes away overflowing with gratitude.

He enters the art shop and demands his picture. The old dealer tells him that he has sold it, and that the picture is hanged over. John carries it away. He mounts the steps of the mansion of Andrew Craig. Mr. Craig is somewhat disparagized until John displays his canvas, and the lover of art is won. He offers John a handsome price. John accepts it and promises to bring more of his work for inspection.

After a month John and his young wife are happily located in their pretty little flat. John's new studio is in connection with the flat and orders for pictures are coming in faster than he can handle them. The year is over. The happy young artist is a father, and prosperity is smiling all around him. He takes the talisman and, kissing his family good-bye, goes out to solve the mystery of his fortune.

The seal is broken, the box opened, and eagerly the young artist removes the contents. It is a small card, and on it is written:

"Grit and perseverance always win.
Discouragement is the coward's cook."

TWO GIRLS.—Edward Holbrook has in his employ two stenographers, Estelle Vanderhouse and Mary Adams. Estelle, who is superficially attractive, is his favorite, and she impresses him to so great an extent that he decides to propose to her. Her mental treatment however of a little newsboy, causes him to be less precipitate in his intentions, and he determines to investigate a little before declaring his love. He disguises himself as an old beggar and calls early in the morning at Estelle's home and asks for something to eat. Her mother is washing and the whole atmosphere of the house indicates a very unsteady household and a hard-working mother, who uses a slipper on her daughter's whims and bad temper. The old lady gives him food as Estelle enters, ringing takes the food from him and puts him out into the street. He next goes to the home of Mary and finds conditions entirely different. Her mother is an invalid and is her daughter's one loving care. He is asked in and given refreshment and treated as though he were an honored guest. When about to depart he is given an overcoat to take the place of the ragged one he is wearing, a coat that belonged to her widow's dead son.

Edward, thankful that he has learned in time what Estelle's true character is, and what true, sweet nature Mary possesses, naturally is drawn towards the other girl. He proposes to Mary and is accepted. Estelle finds a communication from Edward, in which he tells her that her services will be no longer required, and makes it plain to her that he was the beggar whom she so cruelly turned away.

OSTEOPATHY.—Brown thought he had rheumatism—he knew it. He taxed the ingenuity of his physicians. They told him there was not much the matter with him, but Brown told them he was a sick man.

One morning at the breakfast table Mrs. Brown found an advertisement in the paper proclaiming Osteopathy as the real cure for all ills. Of course Brown thought that Osteopathy would especially benefit his case. Brown went. Brown saw the Osteopathist, and what happened to Brown was sufficient. Well, Brown was sacked, but he did not know it until he returned home.

A CURE FOR LAZINESS.—Mrs. John Brown was suffering from a complaint which puzzled doctors and nonplussed them. They resorted to all the resources their science and skill could command, and finally stated that if the patient could be induced to take exercise and mental work there was a possibility that she might be cured of her lethargic condition.

Brown let upon what proved to be a brilliant idea. With this in his mind he interviewed the advertising manager of a large department store and made the proposition to him to pay for a full page advertisement in a daily paper, and that fourteen sets of articles done by the feminine head of the house, which he would himself supply. The terms were to be ridiculously low. The offer was accepted and the first of the articles was accepted and the following morning the ad appeared in the papers.

After much trouble Mrs. Brown was induced to write the articles, and when opening the morning paper instead of the usual grumble, Mr. Brown gave his partner and all and sundry the information that she had written her first article for the department store and then put two Australian bank notes in the envelope provided. Mrs. Brown got to the paper and was soon lost in the wonderful ad. With true womanly instinct she imagined all of that good stuff was written for her assistance and joined the bustling ranks of humanity hastening.

She bought and bought and bought, for the bigger fool everyone knows unexpected sums seem to burn holes in one's pocket, and everyone would have imagined from the way she was in the store that she was the wife of a millionaire. Mrs. Brown got to the paper and was too tired to read the her Artist has forsaken it and is gone.

Soon it is brought to the notice of the unconscious maid a gifted daughter regularly to her mother. The woman, instantaneously, comes to a decision and resolves to the utmost power of her will to keep secret. Aside in the street, the servant finds a baby on the door-steps from breathing, even time.

The daughter became in some way reliable who are supposed to be employed and are so overjoyed. She announces funds to conduct home. They do so and, at the middle of her possession and wonder. Susan regains consciousness and is gratefully happy that they have escaped the fate of the street.

THANHOUSER.

CHARITY OF THE POOR.—A self-centered rich man, loves but one person in the world, his daughter. The girl has no interest in pleasing her, and finally she elopes. The father hates nothing of the girl for a year. Then a doctor brings her and her little baby to his home. The husband has died. It is a pitiful scene. The father pokes fun at her. He hates the child. He directs the butler to leave the little one at an asylum, and tells her daughter that her baby is dead. The girl, separated from her baby, becomes sick and physicians tell one further that without her little one she will soon die. So he goes to the asylum to reclaim the child.

But there they have no record of the infant. The servant, it seems, had carelessly left the child on the doorstep, half turned on the snow and gone away after a ring of the bell.

But time was kind to the unfortunate babe. On the day it had been abandoned a rare couple, shocking and helpless, had decided to take their own babe over to charity. The external set out for the asylum, mourning to leave his little one there.

On the steps he found the other infant, and dead in the snow. Bravely he determined to secure its right for existence, and set attention to baby while he had strength to stand.

Charles returns home. Shortly after, he again receives a letter from Mr. Cosine wherein he regrets his inability to call in person, and is therefore sending a worthy representative to the ranch.

Great is Charles' horror to discover in that worthy representative, Mr. Cosine's daughter, and equally great is the lady's rage and anguish to find the man she loved married. Just when a woeful conflict is impending between the two, and which is crowned by Robert, the young wife enters.

Realizing the importance of quick means of suppressing a scandal, Robert follows Charles to the smoking room right in time to prevent his brother from committing suicide. One day he urges her to go away with him. Mrs. Revol promises. No sooner has her letter left her, than she sits down and pens a letter to the man. A little later, a life long servant of old Dr. Revol notices on the blotting paper, a facsimile of a portion of Mrs. Revol's letter. When the doctor is told of his wife's unfaithfulness, he is heart-broken. While he sits alone, his servant informs him that an accident has happened, and a friend awaits him in the next room. One glance at the patient tells him that he is the very man who has broken his life. His first impulse is to flee, but he dresses the wounds. While he is working over him, a package of letters fall from the wounded man's pocket. The doctor picks them up. On his way to his room, he encounters his wife, and receives her of unfaithfulness.

The doctor leaves her, and reads the accusing letter. He has not read many lines, when the expression of his face changes from one of dull despair, to that of relief. He hastily seeks his wife, whose pardon he implores, and thus is Jeanne Revol proven a faithful wife.

One day when Willie was talking with Winnie, he was caught by her guardian, who informed Winnie's parents. Willie interviewed Winnie's parents, and convinced them that he was worthy of their daughter's hand. All would have been well had Willie not dropped the witheism message received from his father, just where his prospective father-in-law was bound to find it and which caused that gentleman to misconstrue his mind as to Willie being a desirable son-in-law.

Arriving at his hotel, Willie finds a satisfactory reply to a cablegram he had sent his father earlier in the day. Willie hastens to impart the good news to Winnie and her parents. Winnie's parents, however, receive him coolly and her father shows the manifest-making wireless to Willie. Willie pleads his ability to support a wife now that he has won a fortune, but Mr. Wynn is obdurate and only relents when Willie produces his father's reply, giving his consent to his son's marriage.

AN ADVENTURE IN SICILY.—Bob Strong, an American in Sicily on business, has been the guest of Don Sebastian for some months. The Don was a widower with an only daughter just verging into womanhood, and upon her developed the duty of entertaining her father's guest.

The Don's principal source of income was derived from the sulphur mines which had been in his family for generations. Unfortunate investments had forced the Don to mortgage his property.

The mine he borrowed the money from was a retired banker, but in reality Rizal, the chief of a band of brigands from which source he derived his immense fortune.

The mortgage fell due and the Don was much depressed by reason of the fact that he would be obliged to ask for a further period.

Bob Strong learned of his host's difficulties and offered his help, which the Don in his pride refused to accept. The Don's daughter unaware of her father's predicament, refuses Rizal's offer of marriage and when Rizal observes that the daughter's affections are for the young American, these two men have words and a quarrel in which Bob insults Rizal. The disappointed bandit chief, Rizal to be revenged, has his band capture and bring Bob to the bandit stronghold, which is situated in a wooded out part of the sulphur mines. To complete his revenge he determines to steal the Don's daughter and to marry her in the presence of the captive American.

An English tourist on a hunting expedition sees the captive and, as a disguise and interferes in the use of his long-range rifle one after another of the brigands is killed or wounded and not knowing from whence the destructive shots are coming, fly in consternation leaving Bob and the Don's daughter to be released. Before dawn, the brigand chief had brought to his strong hold to perform the marriage ceremony.

The young people arrive safely at home without the knowledge as to who their deliverer was, until the British marksman puts in his appearance and explains the mystery.

A MAID'S REVENGE.—Mr. Ingram in need of a stenographer, advertises. After interviewing a number of applicants decides to take a capable looking young man.

The next scene is laid in Mr. Ingram's home. In the kitchen the maid is engaged in a delicate confab with a traveseur. The man has his arm around the maid's waist and is about to kiss her when from parts unknown is interrupted by the appearance of Mrs. Ingram. Stunned and indignant on the treatment that her maid is receiving she orders the maid to leave the house. He gathers rather suddenly and after his departure Mrs. Ingram gives her maid a good scolding for her conduct.

The maid shows strong resentment at the way the mistress has talked to her and she decided to get even, which she does in a very novel and original way by leading Mrs. Ingram to receive by false and subterfuge that our assistant Mr. Ingram is false to her and that he loves his maid stenographer.

Mrs. Ingram, wild with indignation and suppressed jealousy goes to the office intending to confront husband and his affinity in a most serious fit and proceeds to run interviews into the office on finding her husband absorbed in his correspondence behind the screen. Tumbling on this crowd of three ladies, one of whom she accuses of having designs on the affections of her husband with the same astounded the girl and accused, she sees in a very serious light and starting at her in bewilderment. After explanations are offered and the cause of the trouble ascertained, they all have a good laugh at the situation.

Two things to talk about this time: First, when electricity gives out we can supply you with the lime light outfit and give you gas. This occurs from time to time, and you will lose money if you have no arrangement for a substitute.

Second, as to your machine, don't let it get out of repair. Let us put it in order for you before your customers find it out. We have expert men to keep all in the best of order.

who has ever used a "STANDARD" never wants to go back to another make. WHY? Because the "Standard" is troubleproof, because it projects better pictures, and because it does not eat up profits for repairs. If your Film Exchange don't handle it they are not up with the times, or can make larger profits by selling you an inferior make. Buy a "Standard" under our guarantee and be protected.

RELEASED FRIDAY, APRIL 21
A Reelful of Thrill

Weighed in the Balance is a great spectacular reel that we're glad to stick our trade-mark onto, for its supreme merit will redound to that trade-mark's credit. Still, it may harm us by making you look for a run of like subjects, and it's difficult to "do" a "Weighed in the Balance" every week. Likely it's our best effort in the spectacular line since "Governor's Daughter." While we can't guarantee a weekly prototype, we can say that 1911 will see many more pictures as good as this, and a few even better.

Direct with the Exhibitor

We want the exhibitor to ask us just how and why we make our every move that concerns him; we solicit his interest.

ON THE OTHER HAND—the interests that seek to monopolize the market also seek to present a policy which they term "Conservatism." It is only a sham. The men at executive desks do not deal with the exhibitor direct, but agents and representatives, who are under instruction, are every day carrying on their campaign of threat and intimidation. EVERY MAN WHO OWNS A SHOW KNOWS IT——

All Imp Films Are Now Made On Eastman Stock

See that you get these next releases:

"The Stampede"

Released Monday April 17th. A full reel, and every foot of it is warranted by pure merit. It tells the life story of a cattle thief, the plot hinging on a cattle stampede that is a thriller. If your exchange can't give it to you, you're in wrong!

"Resignation"—"The Hero"

Here's a split reel released Thursday April 20th. The first half is a sharp bit of drama; the second half is funny as the deuce. Ask your exchange now if it will have this release; or tell us the name of your exchange and we'll inform you.

Commenting on the Films.

The "commentator" on the films for the MOVING PICTURE WORLD desires to go on record as saying that not only is it impossible for many minds to agree on the merits or demerits of a picture, but that he often finds it impossible to agree with himself after seeing a picture again under different conditions. His instructions from the editor are to see all the pictures of the week at the first run houses if possible and to comment upon them from the viewpoint of the audience. In other words, while he is supposed to keep his eyes upon the picture he is also supposed to keep his ears open for comments made by the spectators. In some places these comments are frequent and audible and sometimes they have entirely altered the opinion formed upon seeing the picture elsewhere.

A picture that is received in stony silence at one theatre is very often loudly applauded at another. There are many reasons for this. The temperament and mental calibre of audiences vary with different localities. Where vaudeville is interspersed with the pictures, the act preceding a picture has an effect upon its reception. If it was a good act and applauded, the picture following may suffer by comparison. Just as frequently the contrary is the case. Then again the musical accompaniment differs greatly, and the possibilities of appropriate and well-rendered music and sound effects to make or mar a picture is indeed very evident to one who sees the same picture in different houses.

Sometimes our commentator finds it necessary to point out glaring defects in a picture. Some manufacturers resent this and say that it does no good as the picture has been made and has passed out of their hands and can not be altered. The few who take this narrow view of criticism are those whose work is no better today than it was at the beginning. Obviously they are the very ones who lift up their hands in horror and say that it is anarchistic to even suggest the possibility of an open market in this country.

Our commentator has been taken to task by ourselves and by others for sometimes overlooking blunders and even making favorable comment on what might really be termed a poor picture. He squares himself by replying that he is following his instructions to form his opinions as far as possible by the impression made upon the audience. We feel justified in demanding this symposium of public opinion rather than a one-man view by the fact that hundreds of exhibitors have stated to us that they depend almost entirely upon the "Comments on the Films" in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD for the selection of their program. Therefore it is our aim to see the films under as many different conditions as possible and report on them as to their capacity to win applause or other marks of appreciation from the audience.

Whenever direct criticism on any picture is made in these columns it is done with the intention of stimulating the manufacturer to more care in the future. It cannot be gainsaid that the marked increase in general quality is very largely due to the watchfulness of the National Board of Censorship and the criticism that has appeared in this and other papers. It is also due to many of the manufacturers to say that they themselves set a standard of quality which has caused others to hustle. The market conditions, however, are such that some of them get by with work which would have been considered miserable three and five years ago.

The European representative of an American film manufacturer recently gave us a very vivid description of the market conditions in Great Britain and on the continent, where films are sold principally to the exhibitor and only after inspection. This phase of the open market he claimed did not favor the manufacturer. Neither, broadly speaking, does an assured output, irrespective of quality. In spite of the conditions obtaining in the European market it cannot be denied that the average technical quality of the American product is decidedly inferior to our foreign importations. Let anyone name offhand a list of the masterpieces of the motographic art and we venture to say that a large proportion of them will be by European manufacturers. True, the American-made product is obtaining a very strong foothold in Europe, but this is very largely if not entirely due to the distinctive character of the subject. The American-made film, depicting American life and American traditions, notably the pioneer life of the West with its glamor and its dangers, is popular the world over and no more so than in America. It generally "goes over," no matter how crudely presented. The American manufacturer has largely availed himself of this opportunity. They have been successful and some of them may have become so intoxicated with that success that they cherish the idea that it is due to their cleverness or superior knowledge and that they can make "pictures," pictures that will hold their own with the march of time and the changes of public fancy.

There is no surer omen of the decadence of any fad or whim of the public than the overdoing of it.

The Crime Poster Again.

From Washington, D. C., we have received several letters, telegrams and newspaper clippings, from an exhibitor, setting forth how he is being persecuted by the local police for using "crime posters" to attract business to his theatre. One of the telegrams, marked "Rush," reads: "Do not publish my letter. Am having more trouble." And other of similar nature indicates that the gentleman is running around in circles like a dog chasing his tail, and at the rate he is going, we are unable at this end to make out head or tail.

This exhibitor is inclined to think that the sudden activity of the Washington police in suppressing crime posters is the manifestation of a deep-seated malice on the part of the police. As an evidence of his purity and loftiness of thought, he has sent us one of the handbills, which he had scattered about in Washington. We reproduce herewith two pictures from that circular, which represent episodes in the life of that famous hero, the Hon. Jesse James and his old pals (?), the Younger Brothers. The reader will observe in one of these views a train hold-up of the most approved kind, the kind that sends a thrill way down into the boots of the small boy, who longs to go and do likewise. Everybody in the picture is armed with a good-sized pistol, and not at all backward in displaying it, while the train stands humbly by, awaiting its fate. In the other picture, the reader will observe a very inoffensive-looking gentleman hanging by his neck at the end of a rope. He is quite neglected on account of the gun play that is going on in the foreround, where a maiden is being rescued by a man with a gun from a mob of other men with more guns. With the burning house in the background we have a regular three ring circus showing us kidnapping, murder and arson, all going on at the same time. Let us then glance at the reading matter that accompanies these pictures on the hand-bill which reads as follows:

DON'T FAIL TO SEE THE GREATEST OF ALL GREAT SHOWS,

JESSE JAMES AND YOUNGER BROTHERS.

YOU CANNOT AFFORD TO MISS IT.

A SHOW THAT WILL LIVE WHEN ALL OTHER WESTERN DRAMAS HAVE BEEN FORGOTTEN.

AN ENTERTAINMENT FOR EVERYBODY, BENEFICIAL TO ALL.

ONE OF THE BEST AND MOST REALISTIC WESTERN DRAMAS EVER SHOWN.

NOT A DULL MOMENT DURING THE ENTIRE SHOW.

IT TEACHES A GREAT MORAL LESSON.

WILL BE SHOWN AT ———————— MOVING PICTURE THEATRE.

ADMISSION FIVE CENTS.

We are glad this Washington exhibitor sent this stuff to us, because we want to know just who the parties are that are uplifting the business in this fashion. The most pathetic part of it all is the air of injured innocence in this man's correspondence. Without a doubt he actually believes that this entertainment of his is a "Great Moral Lesson." This Washington exhibitor will find little sympathy in this office, for we are frank to say that we never read such rot in our lives, and we give the police of Washington all due credit for putting the kibosh on any such nickel-grabbing game as this is.

The moving-picture business in America has been run into the ground by just such exhibitors as this one. In every town you will find one exhibitor who makes it bad for all the rest. He is going to get his out of it while he can. He does not give a rap about the others, nor does he care a particle what anybody thinks, so long as he is able to get away with it. There is no room in the business for these nickel-grabbers who pander to the primitive instincts of half-grown boys, and the sooner they are out of it the better for all concerned. It is our hope that the Washington police will make a "clean-up" while they are at it.

Granting that the picture this man intended to show was really as good as his bombastic circular claims it to be, there might be some reason to be lenient with him. But the Jesse James and Younger Brothers reel is one of the early reels that has long done its part in bring condemnation upon the picture. Therefore, if these children did put up their nickels and go in to see it, they would no doubt have seen an old, worn-out rainstorm on the sheet, one of the worst-acted pictures that ever was made, and in every sense of the word a "lemon" of the choicest vintage. Then they would come out from the place repeating the old refrain, "Stung again."

Ordinarily we would pay no attention to this man and his outburst, but for the benefit of exhibitors at large, we publish these pictures and his circular and dwell upon it at this length. If any of our readers are annoyed in their respective cities by exhibitors of this undesirable type, we request them to make it known to us and send, if possible, some of these lurid handbills and posters, which we will reproduce and do all we can to show up some of these shine showmen who are in the business by mistake.

Pictures in Aid of Medical Science.

The use of moving pictures for scientific purposes was adopted several years ago and has been called upon occasionally both in this and in foreign countries. One of the foremost American concerns to aid medical science in this respect was the Lubin Manufacturing Company of Philadelphia. Mr. Siegmund Lubin, the head of this concern, has been greatly interested in matters of this nature for a number of years and has expended a great deal of money and much of his spare time in promoting their interests.

The latest assistance given by the Lubin Manufacturing Company to the medical fraternity was in the illustration of a lecture by the widely known nerve specialist, Prof. Theodore H. Weisenburg, on "The Gait, Station, Tremors and Other Symptoms of Various Forms of Nervous Diseases," delivered to the members of the Alumni Association of the Department of Medicine of the Medico-Chirurgical College in the Clinical Amphitheatre, Eighteenth and Race Streets, Philadelphia, Penna., on March 21st. The Lubin Company furnished for this occasion a twelve-hundred-foot reel depicting some extraordinary views of a number of patients who had been carefully selected by Prof. Weisenburg.

The Auditorium was packed with the members and their friends, all keenly desirous of witnessing the introduction of this novel and interesting method of instruction. The effect on the audience of the views displayed was most interesting, exclamations of astonishment constantly being heard above the voice of the lecturer.

It is difficult to truly estimate the advance this makes in the teaching of medicine. In many respects teaching by films, rather than patients, is of advantage, for they are constantly at your command and can be shown at any time and moreover students will pay far more attention to a motion picture than to an individual because its novelty makes a far greater impression on his mind and compels his attention.

Scientifically it is also interesting, for no matter how well one observes a patient in life, there are always certain things which can be observed better by photograph. Moreover, it is important from the standpoint of medical history, for not only is it possible to record patients and their diseases, but it will be possible to compare the symptoms, for it is well known that the latter change in the course of evolution and the same diseases may not give the same group of symptoms in the course of years.

Among the patients that were photographed were cases of locomotor ataxia, paralysis of one side of the body resulting from a hemorrhage in the brain, different forms of spinal cord disease, hysteria and different tremors and involuntary movements of the body. Among the most interesting is a patient who has involuntary movements of the tongue in which this organ is protruded far beyond the lips in the most grotesque manner. Again, among the cases of hysteria is a patient who, while lying quietly has no weakness of his limbs, and yet when he gets on his feet and attempts to walk, power to do so becomes increasingly difficult until finally he sinks to the floor totally helpless. Another patient also suffering from a form of functional disease has various grotesque movements of his arms, legs, face and body, some of which are dancing, shuffling, springing, all of them more or less bizarre. In a patient with paralysis of one side of the body the weakness in the limbs is perfectly shown, with the dragging, halting gait.

In the patient who has locomotor ataxia the difficulty in walking is clearly evident. Here the patient could not walk without aid, and for this purpose a rope was stretched across the stage and the ataxic walks while grasping this rope, and it is clearly evident that only for this he would totter and fall. Towards the latter end of the photograph he is shown standing alone with his feet wide apart, swaying in the most uncertain manner, and as he shuts his eyes he falls to the floor, showing in the most wonderful manner the ataxia which is one of the prominent symptoms of the disease. In another patient who suffered from inflammation of all of the nerves of the body there is depicted a so-called "steppage" gait. This patient has toe drop and cannot move his toes, and because of this he is compelled when walking to lift his knees high from the ground, much like a stalking horse, the gait, because of this, being called "steppage."

At the finish of the lecture there ensued a scene of the wildest enthusiasm which was the more singular considering the fact that the bulk of the audience was composed of staid, experienced graduates, many of them members of the faculty of the institution. Some of these latter remarked afterwards that in their opinion this new departure from the beaten path marks another epoch in the history of the medical profession and its new adjunct, the moving picture film.

A correspondent wants to know what distance the camera is placed from the subject when taking moving pictures. It varies greatly, depending, of course, upon the focal length of the lens and the field of view desired in the picture. In studio work, from ten to fifteen feet is customary, although eight feet and even less seems to be the rule with those who amputate the lower limbs to show us facial expression. We might say here that the use of a lens of longer focus and the placing of the camera farther away from the subject would improve the perspective and at the same time give the desired largeness to the figures. It is generally admitted that one firm is responsible for setting the style for large figures, but they did not carry it to extremes and they did not commit the optical errors which others have done. All roundness and relief is sacrificed, and distortion mars any other quality the picture may possess when short focus lenses are pushed up close to the subject to get it large upon the screen. Facial expression in these cases is more frequently contortion.

What Gets Over

By Hanford C. Judson.

The photodrama, like every other art, has its proper sphere and it also has its limitations. As is the work of a young genius, it is often glorious without intention and, when it attempts something rich and fine, it is often commonplace.

I recently spent a very instructive evening at Keith & Proctor's Union Square Theatre. Four photoplays were thrown upon the screen. Every one of them had a theme that differed from all the rest and appealed to different human emotions. They were all good plays and were representative of the very best work. All four were very effective, partially; none was wholly effective. Where they failed, they failed, roughly speaking, for two reasons. They showed in part that we haven't yet mastered the medium, we are still amateurish, and again we seem amateurish in attempting to do what is impossible.

It can be said very positively that nothing that it not clear and plain as day will be wholly effective as drama. The photoplay can show all that the pantomime can show. But it is effective only as it is able to convey human emotion. Where the situation that induces the emotion is plain the emotion comes over-powerfully; but in the legitimate drama the situation is often built up step by step on the information conveyed by words, the question, and its answer. The pantomime actor can picture the emotion perfectly; the audience will see it perfectly and sympathize, but like one who sees another man in grief and doesn't know why he looks so sad; it can guess the reason, but guessing isn't knowing.

In the drama that gets over, it isn't the actor that is played upon but the audience. Clytemnestra's ghost might be seen rising before the sleeping choras of the Furies; but what glorious actress could make the whole situation plain to an audience without the homely, every-day words she uses? Or could any pantomime express the situation into which Oedipus gropes his way in that terrible conversation he and his mother-wife had with the messenger? You say that the photoplay makes no pretense of competing with the legitimate drama. In practice, it does just that and it is one of its worst failings.

The photoplay is still very new, and the attitude of the audiences today is not a good thermometer of any play's true merit or its staying power. One of the photodramas projected was "Athatiah, Queen of Judah" (Pathe), and of the four, this was the only one to which the audience gave any applause. Why did they applaud? It was a Biblical subject and the story known to many; it was beautifully tinted; it was beautifully acted. It also had one glorious scene which, I venture to say, was sent over the footlights more powerfully than any legitimate drama producer has ever before succeeded in getting it over. This was the scene where Athaliah's army begins its move against the temple of Jehovah. The army reaches way out across the distant hillside; it is immense. You begin to feel what a powerful force it is. No stage has room enough to give such an effect. But whenever that army crowds itself into the narrow set-scenes it becomes commonplace, even in actual dramas. In the photoplay it not only becomes commonplace, but it makes the leading actors commonplace, for they haven't the words to hold attention. Perhaps if its size were diminished, this effect could be overcome, partially.

The audiences may have applauded partly because it felt that to see the moving picture of a great drama was instructive and that it was getting its money's worth. The scenario was adapted from Racine's great masterpiece for, but not quite to, the photodrama. No one who could have seen the drama itself would have chosen to see the photoplay, except for personal and temporary reasons. Its great advantage was that it gave much, much more than ten or twenty-five cents' worth, when taken with the other features of the evening. But, you will ask, in giving this, was not the photoplay occupying its legitimate, its best field? Yes and No. The production of "Athaliah" was like the newspaper copy of a great painting. It was useful and instructive, but, considering what it is able to convey at present, such work puts it in the category of the substitutes, the makeshifts. I claim that the photodrama is no makeshift. It has a glorious field of its own. It should cultivate that field, in which it is, and will be, pre-eminent, and utilize every step in the progress of every play to heighten the effect in the scenes where it is already recognized as supreme. The photoplay is thoroughly democratic; the legitimate drama is aristocratic. In the tremendous, epic scenes, the army, the chorus, the mob in the photoplay smothers the star actors. These "stars" will have to lose themselves in the great whole more than they do in the drama if the best effect is to be produced. The proper work of the photoplay is to give life as life really is, at its chosen, dramatic moments, and I believe that we shall find that all the well-known theatrical makeshifts, so effective on the stage, will be less effective in a photoplay than the simplicity of every-day life is. Photoplay producers will find that they will have to discover new and original tricks of their own.

One of the other plays thrown on the screen was "Between Two Fires" (Edison). This is a Franco-Prussian war story, and most of the scenes are in a dwelling. There was no tinting used. Color was sadly needed in one place. The heroine proposed to insure the safety of the château by raising the red-cross flag. The flag is brought out and is is a black-cross flag. Some in the audience may have recognized it at once, but I didn't. As a whole this play was not suitable to the photodrama. It was a drama of intrigue and the gestures of the actors—they were good actors, too, and the producing company is one of the most competent in the field—sent too little of its significance to the audience.

The two other plays, especially the one entitled "A Little Lad in Dixie" (Vitagraph), were natural photoplay dramas. They could not have been so adequately shown on a stage. "A Little Lad in Dixie" came over more adequately than any of the others. But the screen didn't begin to give all its possibilities. In the first place, the acting was bad—except that of the lad and his mother, and the mother's acting could easily have been improved, if the producer had let her be natural and not theatrical. To a man who, like the present writer, has seen active military service, the soldiers in this play were pitiable. Sonny and the deserter defend the pass, and every shot they fire echoes in the hearts of the audience; but when the Yankees attack in force, when the Johnnies come to the rescue and when the camp of the Confederates, with its flag on the outskirts is shown, the scenes were not very strong.

The actors of the last play, "A Thwarted Vengeance" (Essanay), got its whole significance over in fine shape. The only trouble was that the story, though well-acted and suitable to the medium through which it was presented, was not humanly probable. The very pretty and ladylike heroine didn't make a very lifelike barmaid. The last scene was entirely too improbable to be effective.

Film Hits of the Week.

There was a time when we used to devote a column to what we considered the most notable film of the week. This was so delicate a task and so apt to be taken for the gentle effusions of the press agent that any eulogiums are now, as a rule, based upon that safest and surest guide—public opinion.

Of the films of the past week, the highest token of praise belongs to "Athaliah," the gorgeously staged, splendidly acted and exquisitely colored tragedy-drama by Pathe Freres (France). We saw this spectacular production in many houses and never once did it fail to elicit applause, and, being a tragedy, that applause could only be attributed to the excellence of the technique. We had become so imbued with the consistency and the perfection of the magnificent scenes in this film that the shock of seeing a counterfeit poster used to advertise it was so great we must speak of it here. Not over two blocks away from the Pathe New York office we saw one day over the entrance to a store show a gigantic poster advertising "Athaliah" which bore a crude, sensational and gaudy colored scene, entirely foreign to this film. We draw attention to this here because the owner of that particular theatre is a persistent violator of the proprieties in this respect.

The fact that premier mention is given this week to a foreign manufacturer further proves the correctness of our views elsewhere in this paper as to the superior technique of the European product, especially in the great spectacular photodrama. But the Pathe-American Company are getting down to serious work, and this week our old friend Panzer, formerly of the Vitagraph Company, scored a hit in the leading role of "A Fatal Resemblance," a strong dramatic plot which was acted quite up to the standard of the Paris house.

Another European picture which was warmly received on account of its technical excellence as well as the story, was "At the Old Mill," a bit of work that reflects great credit on the Urban-Eclipse Company.

But, if success is to be measured by applause, the American companies come in for a goodly share, and none more so than the Biograph story of "The Spanish Gypsy." It received a salvo of applause in a theatre where applause is very seldom bestowed on a picture. This portrayal of human emotions and sentiment by the Biograph Company can only be compared to their own "Ramona," of a year ago. There is the same subtle coloring, artistic treatment, clearness and strength of plot and skillful selection and posing which made and which sustains the Biograph name. As a picture it left such an impression of completeness that we were not at all surprised to note the applause.

"Sweet Memories" was another picture of the week which received a well-merited share of applause, and this not due to the sentiment or the plot, but to the wholly satisfactory handling of the theme. In "Sweet Memories" the Imp Company set a standard for themselves which we hope will be closely followed. It will require hard work on their part to improve upon it.

Measured by our standard of success, the stamp of public approval, "Jim, the Mule Boy," a portrayal of the dangers of mining, by the Edison Company, stands out as a picture of the week. It is hard to say whether the applause it received was elicited by the noble sentiment portrayed or the excellent manner in which it was staged and acted. "April Fool," another Edison playlet, drew more than the ordinary share of applause. This could be easily accounted for by the charmingly natural acting of the youngsters who played the parts and also the fact that the comedy was clean and fresh and a welcome change from the usual depiction of children's escapades.

Play the Game on the Square.

In a recent number of the licensed film bulletin, the man-who-is-greater than his job of press agent, quotes an article from the Erie "Dispatch" of Erie, Pa., under the following headings: "Condemns Independent Picture Theater." "Erie Dispatch Tells Difference Between Licensed and Unlicensed Houses."

The article goes on to say that uncensored pictures such as shown in the "Bijou" do much harm, and cites the fact that the Bijou featured pictures of the "White Slaves of America," and others of a sensational nature. The article was worded so as to convey the impression that the "Bijou" was an independent theater and contrasted it with the high moral tone of the "Photoplay" theater, a licensed house showing only "carefully censored" pictures.

It happened that a WORLD representative was in Erie last week and sends us the facts in the case. He learned that the article in the Dispatch was written by a person who is interested in theaters competing with the "Bijou." He also learned that the "White Slaves of America" pictures were not independent films, but lantern slides to accompany a lecture and that the lecture had the approval of some of the best men of family in Erie. But to cap the climax of misinformation, it developed that the much lauded "Photoplay" theater was not a licensed house. So the praise extended to them for running a "carefully censored" show is really a feather in the cap of the independents.

As Others See Us.

We are indebted to Mr. F. C. Fuller, an operator in St. Louis, for the following clippings from the St. Louis "Mirror":

The War on the Picture Shows.

Drastic restrictions upon the moving picture shows, the theaters-in-little, will not be approved by the public. The public likes the little theaters and wants them. These little theaters may have hurt the bigger theaters, but not so much as the syndication system has hurt them. And the picture shows wouldn't pull so hard from the big houses were it not for the "tariffic" high cost of living. That the picture shows are making money is no reason why State or city or legislators should "shake them down" for some of it. The places in which the shows are given should be safe from fire and so constructed as to minimize danger in panic. That is about as far as legislation should go. A license may be exacted, but all licenses are outrageous perversion of taxing power. The morals of the shows will be taken care of by the public. Nastiness won't last. The picture shows should be let alone as nearly as possible. They will develop patrons for the theaters, when the theaters get out of the clutch of the trust idea. I am aware that at a banquet of theatre owners and managers in New York lately a speaker made a great hit by telling the auditors that they themselves were a bigger crowd than any "house" they had seen in their own theaters during the past year. The truth of the jest was not the result of the growth of the picture show, but of a time of universal economizing. As in New York, elsewhere. There will be business for all the shows when the people have something left to spend, over and above their outlay for rent and food and clothing. And maybe the little theater will bring down the big theater prices. There are very few shows, these days, worth $1 to per admission. For all of which reasons I should say that legislation against the picture shows has no justification other than the evil one of a "shake-down," though they should possibly pay a license as the other theaters do, but not a prohibitive or burdensome one.

The Devastating Moving Picture.

Having put the theaters out of business, the moving picture show is moving on to other conquests. A downtown picture show has lured to its service the organist at one of the largest Roman Catholic churches in the city. Not even that is as nothing to the other ravages of the film fad. A more frequent allegation than infidelity or neglect in divorce cases is addiction to picture shows. But on the other hand, the saloon men complain that the moving pictures are getting all the money that used to be spent for beer.

A Sociological Study.

Moving Picture Censorship Strangely Helpful in Revealing Social Conditions.

Newspapers in all parts of the country seem to be on the lookout for instances of youthful delinquents whose "fall from grace" may be especially traceable to moving picture suggestions; these items of news are "food for the enemy," besides furnishing subjects for the censor, critic and moralizer to expatiate upon, and exploit their narrow, limited, uneducational views.

Upon the other side, to those possessed of clear sight, a calm, well trained mind, sound and balanced judgment, they present opportunities for searching after facts that shall become the revealers of those truths, so necessary for that perfect knowledge upon which all actions shall be based. Following this latter method we are surprised to find that a careful study of all the conditions, point to singular lessons in the social order of things concerning the youth of the land and of the times. In the first place we have come to reflect upon the extraordinary method by which many towns in every part of the country, are, by their authorities, going back into the centuries and bringing therefrom a revival of the "curfew" law, for the express purpose of fixing a time, not to put out the fire as of old, but to call the children and young people home from the streets. What is it that has led to such drastic action, and the resort to such harsh old-time methods in these progressive days of the twentieth century? Two causes are assigned: first, decreasing parental control and increasing lack of respect for parents and teachers by children; and, secondly, a strange increase and development of youthful tendencies to mischief, evil and ultimately crime, fostered in many instances by a desire while still of immature years, to copy and appear both as efficient and proficient as adults. Hence the boy begins with smoking, and the girl with inordinate dressing, followed by freedom of action and liberty or license to stay out late and to go where they please, until through the failure of home training and authority, the very local governments themselves have been compelled to call a halt. It is at such a time as this that the moving picture makes its appearance and at once becomes universally popular, especially as a friend of the young peowever, to prove that there were those vultures in commercial life, who were ready to use it as a bright attraction to allure the prey they desired to seize. The prey, too, proved often too ready to be caught, and the evil-minded among them eager to turn to profit any suggestion upon which they could seize and enlarge, even to the extent of criminalizing themselves.

Thus true social conditions are revealed, and the moving picture has done its part in bringing to the surface a state of things which will give all right-minded people, interested in the well being of the community and, especially the sociological student, an opportunity to deal with conditions as they find them; and, by a process of elimination, eradicate the evil and establish the good.

The "Moving Picture World" has ever worked thoroughly and successfully for these ends, and it remains for the people, especially those having the oversight of the young, to do likewise; and, instead of hitting back at the moving pictures, they should be thankful for the exposure of these evils and remove them. It is in this very connection that Mayor Gaynor of New York says: "I have seen the moving pictures repeatedly and find little fault with them; the faults rather lie with the parents whose control of their children needs strengthening and to be made more vigilant." What can be the environment, home training, school benefits, or social relationship of any young person of either sex who cannot behold a life story without deliberately selecting the evil as an example to follow? Surely the reveation of this low social and moral scale is appalling. Never is there a drama or a tragedy but the evil is denounced and punished, as a plain lesson and deliberate warning to others. In the speaking theater the villian is only successful as he secures the hisses of the audience, as much as does the hero receive the applause. If any degenerate character goes away to practice the evil he has seen for the purpose of gain, regardless of the consequences, he is alone to blame, and neither the theater or actors are condemned. Rather should those sociological conditions which produce the delinquent be investigated, and a remedy sought in that direction. A youthful burglar recently, upon examination in court, declared that he had learned the 'tricks of the trade" by listening to evidence in the court room of which he was a frequent visitor. How absurd it would be to blame the court; if the "terrors of the law" are not a sufficient deterrent the blame must be placed elsewhere.

A clergyman declared once that he found this perversive spirit evident in an astonishing manner, hearing one of his own Sunday school boys using blasphemous language, gently rebuked him, when to his astonishment the boy replied: "I have heard you say those words in the pulpit." Still further and yet recently, is there not a criticism often made upon allowing the young a too free use of the Bible itself, lest that which is there for warning might be misapplied? True, indeed, but we are living in days demanding more and more an open Bible. Only a little while ago in these pages we challenged the comparison of moving pictures with any other amusement, producing proportionate satisfactory results. We now would raise another point, and ask for the production of any instance, or case, or person, where an evil effect has followed a moving picture exhibition where the home social and educational surroundings have been satisfactory? If this contention is correct it is evident that the fault lies in conditions and is for sociological reflection rather than picture censorship. Studying the social conditions along these lines, the writer has carefully sought for evils in New York City and surroundings, and where weaknesses have appeared in moving picture work he has unhesitatingly pointed them out, and if necessary denounced them; but he has not found in any degree the evils in moving pictures equal to those in the following degrading lines.

Picture Postal Cards.

If moving pictures were thrown upon the screens half or one-tenth as vile as the postal cards upon the streets, the authorities would close all the theaters in one night. They have not only vileness of illustration but beastliness of language, and a suggestiveness so immoral that they are used as mediums for the consummation of evil association by those who look upon them. Were it possible to see the actual outcome of these obscenities the newspapers would have lengthy records to report daily in striking contrast to the ocasional moving picture delinquent.

Sunday Comic Papers.

The Sunday comic papers generally, but especially those of the "yellow press" are mischief breeders, and subsequently crime producers. "Comic" is a misnomer; a burlesque upon the printed page they are tragic upon the young human mind. All the writer asks upon the subject is that the opinion of teachers, parents and ministers be taken and declares it as his opinion that the vote for their expulsion would be unanimous.

Manufactured Journalism.

True journalism is a noble profession, the lawful ambition of an educated youth; but the most wide-spread New York daily is a menace to the social and moral well being of every young person able to read its pages. Its headlines, its news, its editorials, its pictures would be a disgrace to any decent community! So what is it in the center of the world's greatest city? It has more power for evil within the limits of its circulation than have the worst of the moving pictures in the whole world if multiplied a hundred times.

Many other evils could be assailed but these must wait for another opportunity, suffice it for the present to say that it is only too evident that the moving picture is one of the least evils of the day; that its critics are biased and blinded. That a combined attack upon other and more malignant evils would produce better results and prove that without in any way looking upon the foul results of moving picture work, one of its least valuable assets is the fact that at its worst it has, by its weakness, revealed the social evils attendant upon the youth of the land. If, therefore, this is what its weakness can do—what shall its strength be?

W. H. JACKSON.

BRANDT GOES TO MIRROR.

Joe Brandt Brandenburg has resigned from the advertising department of "The Player" to accept the offer made by the New York "Dramatic Mirror" to become associated with its business staff. Brandt was for several years connected with the Hampton Advertising Co., and afterwards with the "Billboard." Owing to an attack of typhoid fever in September of last year, which kept him closely confined until January of this year, Brandt resigned from the "Billboard" forces and later joined "The Player" staff.

As I walked through certain thoroughfares a few nights ago, the thought occurred to me that the flint age of the moving pictures has passed—the day of the skin-flint is in the gloaming and the stone age is at hand. The peanut man is going back to his roaster, the grocer is going back to his scales, and the man who thought he was a better theatrical manager than an oyster opener is seeking his level—that is, when he sells a quart of oysters it will be on the level, because the bivalve and not the pictures are his future.

Not many months ago when a man and wife and two children entered a picture show, it was not uncommon to hear some one announce "Two fries and two on the half shell," or, in some instances hear "Two porterhouses, the cutlets go free." That was in the good, old days, before the reformers got busy and stirred up things to an extent that a man running a picture show was in doubt after supper whether he would reach home or land in a cell. But, my, how things have changed! Now the exhibitor sees nothing before him but fame and glory—if he has the price.

Much has been said about the crusade in New York City against moving picture shows by Mr. Fosdick, who seems to be a Siamese Flynn and Parkhurst. Of course Mr. Fosdick is trying to do his duty, as well as earn his salary, and in many instances he is performing commendable work; but a more strict surveillance upon some of the so-called charitable institutions might disclose that with more compassion and consideration in their favor there would be less children seeking the warmth and shelter of moving picture shows.

It is undeniable that there are some moving picture places in Greater New York that should never have been licensed. Who is to blame for this state of affairs is a point in dispute. Nobody is willing to assume responsibility. Shooting at a target I should put the blame on the license bureau. If an applicant is not a proper person, or if his place does not come within the requirements, he should not receive a license. Exits, aisles, ventilation should be thought out before before taking the applicant's money, or at least, before authorizing the opening of the place. Complaints of the kind now before the municipal authorities and the public have been made for two years or more. Long before Mayor Gaynor took office, his predecessor closed all the moving picture places in Greater New York indiscriminately. This was an unjust action, because care was not taken to distinguish right from wrong, but the mistake was made worse by a subsequent licensing of places without regard to conditions.

I know personally that for years the people engaged in the legitimate moving picture field have been opposed to a certain cheap class of exhibitors for many reasons, among them, the inevitable disrepute that must follow in the wake of the exploiters in that line of business; the burden cast upon the shoulders of those striving to elevate the moving picture business to the plane deserved; and the general tendency of such places to provoke the hostility of the better class of people. Is it, then, a surprise, that when, at last, the municipal authorities are awakening to a sense of their duty that the men of capital, the men of foresight and energy, the big fish, should receive such a cordial welcome to the field. As I stated in one of my previous letters, the big men with big money are steadily gaining a foothold in the moving picture business and ere long there will be few districts in Greater New York at least—that will not have its big picture theater.

According to present statistics, Greater New York now has its one hundredth theater, and the honor of the century mark goes to a moving picture theater. This house is the one to be erected by William Fox at the corner of Broadway and Ninety-sixth Street. Mr. Fox is the head of the William Fox Amusement Company. Among those associated with him is "Big Tim" Sullivan and "Dave" Kraus. The latter runs the Olympic Theater on East Fourteenth Street, and the Dewey, the City and the Academy of Music properties located in the same neighborhood are recognized as being controlled by the same trio in part or whole. The Academy of Music was acquired with the original intention of turning it into a picture house, but popular plays at 10, 20 and 30 have drawn so well the picture project has been deferred.

But as to the century house, a structure that is to cost in the neighborhood of $100,000, let us read what one of the leading New York papers has to say of it: "When opened it will be the finest moving picture theater in the world. That this newest New York theater, too, is to be devoted to nothing else than moving pictures tells only too plainly the wonderful advance that that branch of the theatrical profession has made in the past few years. To-day the moving picture theaters have fairly forced themselves into open competition with the theaters that present only dramatic productions."

That is going some, isn't it? It should take the wind out of the sails of the grouch who says the pictures are losing ground. Not many years ago the pictures were drawn upon by the vaudeville profession for jokes. Sometimes you would hear one say to another "you look so serious you remind me of a moving picture." More than once a cancelled performer has remarked to the booking agent: "Move me as you will, but you cannot make a moving picture of me." And time and time again vaudeville performers have been heard slurringly to refer to the moving picture machine operator, "he and his kit will run about two weeks longer, then the junk shop for his."

* * *

This prediction has been verified in part by developments. Many operators who had neither the foresight or ability to make themselves useful have gone to the junk shop, but the pictures have steadily gained ground, so much so that they are now in "open competition with the theaters that present only dramatic productions," as stated by one of the leading New York papers.

* * *

Have you noticed the change on Forty-second Street, near Eighth Avenue—the house called the American Music Hall? Until a couple of weeks ago that house was running twenty or twenty-two acts of vaudeville in competition with the Manhattan and Hammerstein's Roof. The Manhattan went over to Keith and the American is now in the same row. Some time ago the Motion Picture Patents Company cancelled the American's license because William Morris, its owner, ran unlicensed pictures and the license was not renewed until within the past two weeks. Marcus Loew, the indefatigable Marcus, consolidated with Morris and his name now appears on the front of the house. At that time Marcus was also the mainspring of the People's Film Exchange of New York. Since that the exchange has been sold to the General Film Company and Marcus is running the same class of pictures in the American that he has in his other houses.

* * *

I have already said the Patents Company cancelled the American Music Hall license. Now read this: Marcus Loew and William Morris consolidated. Loew assumes management of the American. Loew moves the People's Film Exchange from the Columbia Theater building to the American Music Hall building; Loew sells the People's Film Exchange to the General Film Company that company dwells in harmony with Loew in the same building. Now it must have taken some figuring to bring this about, don't you think?

I was asked yesterday my opinion of the outlook for the moving picture exhibitor of moderate means and I will repeat here what I said. So many prominent theatrical men with apparently abundant capital are entering the field that it seems the smaller investor must eventually surrender the more attractive locations. The smaller exhibitors must isolate themselves, as it were. They must be the pioneers and be ready to move on when the larger people are attracted to them location. I know of some locations where large picture houses have been opened prematurely and the smaller houses are holding their own. But this is only repeated history. It is only a question of time when the houses on the large scale will control the field, and it seems to me that nothing will bring this about sooner than the apparent determination of the municipal authorities to require every moving picture house to conform literally to the municipal regulations. Still I will admit that the Loews and Lyons can all afford to put up $50,000 or $100,000 houses wherever an exhibitor of less means is making money. There is a time and while there is life there is hope.

ADAPTABILITY?

The educational possibilities of the moving picture seem to be causing much interest in many places; much has recently appeared in print discussing very thoroughly the pros and cons of the prospects.

It is a little surprising, however, to notice how debatable the subject has become, and yet unnecessarily so. The question as to whether the cinematograph is to be admitted into educational circles upon proving its adaptability is absurd! How often is that which is entirely new adaptable?

The steam engine never proved adaptable to the old stage coach; it superseded it.

Gas proved more adaptable than the tallow candle, electricity then gas, each augmented the other. It is only natural to expect that in many instances cinematography will facilitate educational work; at times it will prove of some use at other times it will prove entirely revolutionary and with decided advantage. New York educational authorities have as yet failed to grasp the right idea concerning this new agency; this is excusable because, at present, there is lacking that development, which, when completed, will make education by moving picture a power demanding attention. It has previously been shown that the moving picture will make its first great advance on virgin ground. The above reference to the Philippines is a good example of this truth. Country schools will perhaps forge ahead of city schools, because of the fewer laws and red-tape difficulties there found. These are times when the best methods and the shortest routes are demanded; obstacles only exist—to be surmounted and not debated; mountains will be moved or tunnelled, rivers crossed either above or beneath. Progress is unhindered; if it finds a way by adaptability it uses it; if it does not find a way, then, no matter how revolutionary it may appear, it makes a way. It is born of a higher power than is that of anything that can hinder it, and, while "wise heads" are talking about it, moving picture progress goes ahead unhindered.

IN THE CITY OF CULTURE.

No! Not Boston! That may be the Athens of America but it is not the abode of culture only; to Montclair in New Jersey belongs this distinctive title. Montclair is not a commercial center, it has no business affiliations; it is purely residential. It has the reputation of numbering among its inhabitants more professional people (men and women) than any other town in the United States. It is the abode of a large number of New York City's ablest scholars; while other places may have its daily train of millionaire commuters, or business men's special, Montclair has its daily scholarly train with its precious load of brains and culture. Is another distinctive feature necessary? Here it is. Montclair has a larger number of telephones than any other town or city in the world; not only in proportion to the inhabitants but also in proportion to any given number; one telephone to every two houses in town is their proud record. Why all these details? The moving picture has invaded Montclair and the people are aroused.

The moving picture has been accepted in the halls of learning! what is going to be its fate in the homes of the learned?

Prejudice has had its first battle and lost. The New York World in a wise and timely editorial rebuked the first evidence of prejudicial opposition. The process of elimination has already commenced; expressions of opinion already current have decided that there shall be no combination with the vaudeville. There worthy, scholarly people are to be congratulated on their first decision; it is only such as was to be expected from them. Again, "cheap sensational shows" are tabooed; this, also, is in accordance with good taste. There can be no doubt that by the time Montclair has held its great public meeting, the result will not only be complimentary to the genuine moving picture enterprise, but a tribute to the pleasure-giving educational value of the highest form of cinematographic art. Judging, therefore, from its unique position as an abode of educated—refined minds, the verdict of the people of Montclair will be valuable; we anticipate its welcome tribute.

WONDERFUL.

It has ever been an argument in favor of the superior nature of moving picture scenery, over that to be seen in the theater, in that the one is real while the other is artificial. In a recent picture the following extraordinary scenes were the background of the play enacted: A view of a railroad train passing through beautiful country; also a view of the interior of the same train. A view of beautiful mountain scenery, as seen from the train, climbing a steep ascent to a hotel with further views in, about and from the hotel. A scene upon an ocean steamer, also upon a lake steamer; other scenes in connection with a trolley car, an automobile and a motor-boat.

All these were given, not as scenic views, but as the scenery of the drama of life being enacted in connection therewith. Such a scope and variety is absolutely impossible in the finest theater in the world. The trouble and cost in procuring these scenes must have been enormous. The educational values were of greater effect than the play they supported, so that to the observing mind they were simply wonderful.

Some young people who saw them expressed their delight with the advantages presented, making the writer feel that it is more than worth while to direct the attention of people to the scenery which is often—as in this case—of more value than the play.

EDUCATING THE PHILIPPINOS.

The predicted value of the cinematograph as a teacher of peoples of foreign speech, and of the illiterate, has recently been emphasized in an unusual manner and to a very large degree. In the Philippine Islands the American authorities experienced great difficulty in enforcing many of the necessary civilized customs upon the inhabitants of many interior places on the numerous islands. There was not only the difficulty with another language, but the numerous dialects coupled with illiteracy and ignorance, making the task an almost unsurmountable one. The introduction of the moving picture has very largely solved the problem in that (while lacking in detail) it has provided a most general method by means of its "universal language," in conveying to the mind of these people, habits and customs so necessary for their general welfare. It is a strange fate which brings together the greatest need, and the greatest help; little do these people know of the value of this great power making it possible to lift them from their lowest depths to the high level of the most civilized, in a short space of time, but a few years ago considered impossible. It is a pleasure to record this further, yet not unexpected advance.

A STIMULUS.

A monthly magazine is offering $250 in prizes from $50 downwards for the best fifty-word answer to the question, "Which motion picture story do you like best and why?"

If there is a healthy response to this question the contest should be helpful; positive declarations of the good qualities of pictures will also suggest, by deduction, what the poorer qualities are; we shall also look for the educational value in the answers.

"THE BOOKS OF THE MASSES."

The above new title appears singularly appropriate to the moving picture in relation to the "masses." The hard toiler, who has neither the time or inclination for books, finds his library in the moving picture. In another article this shall be more extensively dealt with, showing how thoroughly the moving picture is not only the poor man's theater, but the library of the people.

L. F. S. says.—"I have been connected with the show business in some capacity nearly all my life, both on the stage and in the orchestra, and am at present playing drums and traps in a moving picture theater. I write this not in a spirit of criticism, but more as a suggestion. I notice a great deal has been said of late concerning sound effects and their use in wrong as well as right places. You lay a great deal of stress on the idea of not trying to get a laugh where none was intended by the producer. Now, Brother Sinn, this is all right in the main, but I have often seen plays with dead spots in them which had to be lightened up with a "laugh-getter" of some kind, often to the salvation of the act, and originally no laugh was intended by the author and none was striven for by the stage director at the primary rehearsals. After the play was produced it was found necessary to lift up certain scenes and a laugh was about the first thing to be suggested. Now, a photo-play is only a play in miniature, and is built on the same lines, governed by the same laws and subject to the same defects as its more pretentious rival of the stage. Don't you think the same thing might apply here at times? Especially as picture plays are produced in such rapid succession as to preclude that careful attention to detail that a stage play has. I think so. In fact, I have seen a few pictures—one in particular which, though it did not contain a single legitimate laugh, yet had a scene in which it was easy to get one, and as it was far enough removed from the serious part of the picture so as not to interfere, it helped the picture in my estimation. Of course one must use judgment. The idea I am trying to convey is that it is worth while to put an audience in a good humor when it can be done without detracting from the picture. It is common enough in stage productions; why not here?"

This is dangerous ground you are treading on now. Your proposition also may be "all right in the main," providing one has discernment, ability and the necessary experience in matters dramatic. I do not question either the ability or the good intentions of any moving picture musician, but your suggestion involves more than these things. To carry it out logically one must possess not only dramatic talent, or at least dramatic instinct, but he must also have some knowledge of the technical part of an actor's work. It is very true that picture plays are produced in rapid succession; it may be possible that some of them do not receive as much attention to the little details as a stage production would. (This could be made a matter for argument.) It is also true that the pictures are shown in the same rapid succession in which they are produced, and this fact you should bear in mind. You say you have had experience on both sides of the footlights, and cite as an illustration plays which have been carefully rehearsed and tried out before the public and then lengthened up in places by the same people who rehearsed and produced it. That is all very well. They are in a position to know if an improvement is necessary and have ample opportunity to experiment until the desired results are attained. The same thing does not apply to moving picture exhibitions. We see each picture but a few times, usually in conjunction with other pictures, vaudeville or illustrated songs, and the average musician has neither the time nor the inclination to give them the careful study a stage production would receive (to say nothing of the requisite technical knowledge of dramatic "whys and wherefores"). Your application does not hold good in both cases, and I should consider it exceedingly unwise to sow broadcast any such suggestions. Perhaps you can do these things safely, but there are many who should not attempt it. It is not a difficult matter to make certain people laugh, it is not always so easy to hold their attention to the serious parts of a photo-play. If a drummer can recognize all the sound effects the picture suggests, and eliminates those which will interfere with the impression the picture should leave on the audience, he has done all that can be expected. I am a firm advocate of sound effects and believe they should be introduced whenever possible, except in such cases as mentioned above.

From Wisconsin.—"Copies of the Moving Picture World received, and I am delighted to find I can procure them here. I have been reading your articles with much interest, and find them very helpful. I take the liberty of asking you to send me a list of music I have been playing for the pictures for about five weeks and find myself handicapped by lack of music appropriate for certain pictures. I have nothing suitable for hurries, fires, heavy drama, agitation, mystery, etc. Any suggestions you can offer will be greatly appreciated."

The writer evidently wants to know where she can get melo-dramatic and other music. A list of titles and other information has been forwarded. I am willing to do this for those who are really seeking information, and if my efforts are of any assistance I am glad to know it. For several weeks I have held open this offer of forwarding a list of titles of standard numbers appropriate for picture work, being prompted solely by the desire to help so far as lay in my power. I regret to say that many write me in the vague hope that they are going to get some music for nothing. To these I am compelled to say "save your stamps." The making out of these lists encroaches on a great deal of my time and I do not think you are treating me fairly to ask for them unless you want them. (This does not apply to the above correspondent, who is evidently sincere in her request.)

From Oklahoma.—"I have been reading your advice on playing the pictures and think if all the pianists would use their own heads a little with what advice you donated them there would be more real 'picture pianists.' I have been playing pictures two years and I never think of having our operator give me an outline of the show. No doubt some of the wise will say 'impossible,' but I memorize everything. One of your correspondents said 'no one but fakers could keep playing the pictures continually,' but I disagree with him for I read at sight, only I get everything in my noodle and at my finger tips, so as to be ready for anything when it shows up in the film. I have studied out imitations of pipe organ, engine whistle, electric pianos, auto horn, chimes, wind, bird noises, clarinet, etc. I get my bugle calls out of the United States manual, and play them just as they would be played on the battle field. On St. Patrick's night I played 'Echoes of Ireland' as an overture and got a good hand on it. I find there are several pieces that can be used for the same thing, such as a love scene, viz.: 'All that I Ask Is Love,' 'Love Me and the World Is Mine,' 'That's Some Love,' etc. I claim no one can play pictures right and use music (i. e., look at music), for things change so quick sometimes you can only use a few bars, then jump to something else. It would keep an orchestra leader busy arranging scores, and then they would miss some of it. If every musician will keep up to the late stuff and play it so as to get people acquainted with it, they would know how to appreciate the music to the picture. If you think this is fit to publish, all well; if not, throw it in the waste basket."

I like to put anything in his page that is apt to interest the readers thereof. What you say about memorizing is all right in principle, but I do not see how any one can accompany pictures properly who has to keep his eyes on a page of music. As to the orchestra, a leader does not have to arrange scores for the members. Others than piano players can and do memorize their music. It is essential to have a variety of themes in your noodle and at your finger tips." But I don't see how this applies to getting an outline of the show from the operator. You say you never think of such a thing. There must always be a first time to learn something about your picture—with most of us this is generally at our first sight of it, but I believe that any advance information could not come amiss to it through the kindness of the operator or elsewhere. As to your imitations some of them of course are made on the piano, the others—perhaps that is your secret. Glad to hear from you whenever you have anything to say, and don't be afraid of the waste basket.

Penn. Says among other things: "Now tell me what to play for French pictures." Possibly the correspondent refers to the classic pictures frequently given by the Pathé Company and Eclipse productions. It is difficult to give anything definite which can be applied generally to pictures of this class, though I have committed myself to try it some time. They are always dramatic in character and work up along the usual dramatic lines, though the music should be of a little higher order than the ordinary melo-dramatic stuff. If correspondents care to take the trouble to examine scores of standard operas, symphonies and the better grade of music generally, they will often find movements and parts of movements which are adaptable to picture work. For the picture "Athalia," Mr. King's orchestra played the following: "Tannhouser March" (Wagner) through the first scenes. A mysterious agitato through the vision scene. The next scene (in which the sacrifice is shown), organ music till queen enters. Then agitato music of different kinds (light and heavy —I think three numbers were used) till finish. I have no synopsis of either the story or music at hand, so I cannot give the "cues" for beginning or stopping each number, but this may convey an idea of the nature of the picture.

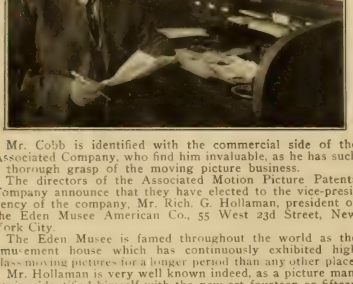
C. Lang Cobb, Jr.

Of the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company.

Mr. C. Lang Cobb, Jr., of the Associated Company has had several years of very varied experiences in the moving picture field, having attacked the business from its many aspects. He has been associated with the Edison Company, Vitagraph Company and the Kalem Company. He has acted in their pictures, has familiarized himself with camera and dark-room technique and has thus acquired a very good knowledge of the business.



Mr. Cobb is identified with the commercial side of the Associated Company, who find him invaluable, as he has such a thorough grasp of the moving picture business.

The directors of the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company announce that they have elected to the vice-presidency of the company, Mr. Rich. G. Hollaman, president of the Eden Musee American Co., 55 West 23d Street, New York City.

The Eden Musee is famed throughout the world as the amusement house which has continuously exhibited high class moving pictures for a longer period than any other place.

Mr. Hollaman is very well known indeed, as a picture man, having identified himself with the new art fourteen or fifteen years ago. He has unequalled knowledge of the business, is well respected by all classes of people throughout the United States and other parts of the world, is an enthusiast in the work of uplifting the picture and will be of great value to the Associated Company in the broad and comprehensive policy which it is undertaking.

SCIENTIFIC CAMERAMAN WANTED.

The International Harvester Company of America, Michigan Avenue and Harrison Street, Chicago, are taking advantage of the motion picture to demonstrate their implements to the farmer. They have already one lecture film on circuit, entitled: "The Romance of the Reaper," and they are preparing another industrial film somewhat on the lines of the Edison picture, "The Man Who Learned." In order to show the advantages of the proper preparing of the seed bed for growing both corn and wheat, they desire to have made a moving picture film of a small field of wheat and corn, showing the planting and growing of the improperly prepared and of the properly prepared seed beds. This will necessitate the taking of a few pictures every day, and cover a period of probably three months' time. They say that they have applied to the film manufacturing concerns of Chicago, and have been informed that they cannot spare anyone from their staffs to do the work at this time. The International Harvester Company would like to hear from anyone who is competent to undertake this work for them. Applicants may address Mr. C. B. Lloyd, care the Moving Picture World.

London Letter.

By A. E. Taylor.

The cinematograph industry here is protected so to speak, by five associations. We have the Kinematograph Manufacturers' Association, the Kinematograph Trade Protection Society, the Cinematograph Defence League, and the Kenters' Association. Then the operators have their own association and the only sheep without a shepherd are the exhibitors. Naturally with so many societies there is a considerable overlapping and a consequent wastage of funds. This has led to considerable feeling that it is desirable to combine all interests in one society to be called the Kinematograph Trades Association. There would be a president, vice-president and executive council, composed of four representatives from each section of the trade. Should the idea fructify the executive council would be charged with the settlement of all matters affecting the industry as a whole, sectional committees dealing with matters affecting their own sections.

There is quite a boom here in Shakespearian films, the Beerbohm Tree Henry Eighth film having acted as an impetus in this direction. The Nordisk Co. are releasing an exceptionally fine Hamlet, whilst the Cooperative Film Co. have secured Julius Cæsar, which, by the way, was filmed with F. R. Benson's Company at the home of the historic bard at Stratford on Avon. This should prove of interest to people on your side of the ocean, of whom there are no more ardent devotees of the immortal bard.

The latest innovation in pictures here is the utilization of the moving picture apparatus in a kind of Peppers Ghost business. By means of mirrors placed at certain angles and strong lights, living performers stationed on a high black-draped rostrum at one side of the stage are projected in their natural colors upon a screen simultaneously embellished with an ordinary scenic lantern slide. Fine subjects were quite satisfactorily demonstrated recently in public. Spoken dialogue and all sounds were, of course, distinctly conveyed to the auditorium. The ulterior intention is to present a complete playlet or operetta, and the possibilities of such an achievement cannot be gainsaid.

I was fortunate enough to have a chat with Mr. Prieur of the Lux Company the other day prior to his departure for Paris, after his return from your country. He does not seem particularly enamored of America, and opines that it is practically useless to attempt to do much business there without producing in your country. He has secured the agency for Nestor films and we are waiting here for the first release. If the product is good it will go right enough, for Prieur is just the man to make it, but it must be good.

Bison films are now being put on the market here and are meeting with a certain amount of success. Pharos films have made a decided hit. The photographic quality is excellent and their film of the German Naval Manœuvers should interest your people.

The Powers cameragraph is selling like hot cakes in this country and everyone I have met is most enthusiastic over it. All users of it back it against any other make with the exception of the Tyler Ernemann which runs it more than closely and of which the Tyler Apparatus Co. sold no fewer than twenty-six last week, not a bad record for seven days even with the picture business booming as it is now. There is no doubt that the Powers is a fine projector. The pictures are rock steady and once it is got running users guarantee it to go like Tennyson's "Brook" forever.

A Mr. Watters has invented a screen through which pictures are projected in bright sunshine and are yet clear and distinct. No change is made in the machine or film, but the screen is made of an original substance that reproduces on the other side pictures as good as if given in a darkened room.

Mr. E. H. Montague, who has come over here to represent Selig, is opening his offices at Film House next week and I predict for him a success. Selig films have been handled up to now by Markt & Co., who are agents for many American makers and consequently may not have received all the attention they were worth. With Friend Montague, who is a hustler, to push them for all they are worth and devote his whole time to them, I venture to assert that the Selig trademark will be seen even more frequently on the screen in the six thousand picture theaters in this country than ever before. It is strange but true that now there are few American makers who have not a representative here.

The Kind of Showman Cinematography Evolves.

By Robert Grau.

Will the wonders of moto-picture endeavor never cease? One would suppose now that Marcus Loew has reached his goal, and has become within five years the central figure of the show world, that there would be a general period of rest, and that interest would now center in observation of Mr. Loew's remarkable progress, but developments are coming so thick and so vigorously that it becomes the province of the writer to record here their significance.

William Fox.

A fortnight ago, by reason of the amalgamation between Wm. Morris and Marcus Loew, it was supposed that the vaudeville and moving picture families were indulging in one grand "ten party" and that permanent peace had been restored in quarters where for a decade before the warfare had been persistent and constant.

And now comes merrily on the scene the intrepid wizard of East 14th Street, William Fox, who three years ago began to tempt fate with a little store theater in Brooklyn and who now has a dozen theaters in Greater New York alone. Mr. Fox is another of those men who grasped the significance of the moving picture advent and who in the short space of three years has risen to a state that has caused the amazement and admiration of the entire amusement profession, but until two weeks ago Mr. Fox was regarded merely as an immensely successful showman, who was to be reckoned with in any attempt to forecast the future of "pop" vaudeville.

The writer has expressed himself repeatedly as regretting any combine between business men of the theater, which tends to restrict operations, and to smother the ambitions of men whose careers have shown great achievement, hence the procedure which brought about an end to all "opposition," was likely also to mean a retrograde movement, for when the incentive which opposition provides is lacking, there is little stirring to induce young and ambitious men to extend their operations and such a condition rarely leads to an uplifting era.

The question thus became not as to whether "a new Moses" would apear on the horizon, but whether some one already in the fold, unwilling to identify himself with a retrograde movement, would assume the aggressive, and thus create what in due time will be called "a new opposition."

Such is the significance of William Fox's latest moves; that of leasing the Grand Opera House in Brooklyn and the New York Theater in Manhattan, the two houses being added to his already formidable chain of palatial and money-making theaters.

Oh ye exhibitors of cinematography! Watch well the progress of this man's career—no greater incentive can be provided for the rising generation of showmen than to observe the march to his goal of this genius of the picture theater, who began life humbly and not so very long ago did a "turn" with Cliff Gordon, the two being known as the Schmaltz Brothers; they appeared at Clarendon Hall, not a stone's throw from the scene of Mr. Fox's present great triumphs on East 14th Street.

Twenty-five dollars a week was the salary paid to these two boys. Mr. Gordon now is a rich man and as a performer can command $500 a week. Mr. Fox, however, came into the limelight just three years ago, when he had the courage to pay a yearly rental of fifty thousand dollars for the Dewey Theater, which prospered so greatly as a distinctly moving picture theater, that its lessee began to expand in every direction. He added the Star, the Gotham and the Family theaters in Manhattan; several theaters in Brooklyn; built a new and beautiful playhouse in the Bronx, and in the last two weeks has defied the element composed of a number of gentlemen who plot and plan on the fifth floor of the Long Acre Building for the reduction of all independent movements, by deliberately entering their zone and fearlessly inviting their wrath, by leasing a theater on which the fixed charges are more than $100,000 a year, and there presenting entertainments in which the "daylight photo play" is featured as the compelling attraction.

Will the wonders of "pop" vaudeville never cease? Already we have witnessed through the achievements of Messrs. Loew and Fox the spectacle of eighteen theaters in the greater city having their problems solved by the camera man, but the greatest spectacle of all will be provided when account is taken of the results achieved through the incentive these two men are furnishing to hundreds of young men who are now enjoying a share of the prosperity which their success has made possible for the new generation of moving picture and vaudeville showmen.

ANOTHER LITHOGRAPHIC MASTERPIECE.

Again we are forced by admiration to reproduce one of the handsome lithographic posters that are put out by the Rex Company for the benefit of exhibitors in making a tasty lobby display. This poster of "The Heiress," which is reproduced herewith, we have seen and it is a very handsome piece of work in full colors. It is needless to say that these posters of the Rex Company have been a great benefit to the business and to the exhibitor in particular, and we are pleased at all times to let the exhibitor know in this way what is being done for his benefit by such an enterprising company as the Rex people.

The So Called Daylight Screens

Editor Moving Picture World.

The Film Index recently published an attack upon the Herbst full-light process (patent 693,671), which betrayed either absolute ignorance or wanton malice, as many of the most important assertions made were diametrically opposed to the facts, and a plain statement of the simple truth will undoubtedly be of interest to your readers, since it is based upon practical experience.

I venture to reply, also, because, having been for fifteen years an operator and exhibitor, associated in the early days with such pioneers as Nicholas Power, Percival Waters, Stuart Blackton, Albert Smith, Edwin Porter, Eberhard Schneider and others, I think no one will challenge my practical knowledge and experience from the feed wire to the screen.

Drawing an unfavorable comparison between the Herbst process and the Rothapfel "daylight" system, the Index says that with the latter "the wiring of the house is properly done, the projection machine is put in first-class condition, then the screen is treated to give the strongest reflection of light, and the house lights are properly shaded so their rays will not strike the screen." Remarkable indeed! What is there in this which was not done long before "daylight" pictures were heard of? The Rothapfel system, however, also employs a black border around the actual picture; and to whatever extent this may result in betterment of the picture or better lighting of the auditorium it is entitled to full credit.

Every practical operator, however, knows that the "proper wiring" in this case means simply more amperes at the arc and consequent bigger bill for current to secure stronger projection upon the screen and overcome the house lights; and, stripped of all misleading discussion, the Rothapfel system deals primarily and, so far as any innovation is concerned, wholly with the screen.

The Herbst process deals with the matter of projection solely; the one and only basic essential in the production of a good picture. The Index describes the apparatus as "a stereopticon set up beside the projection machine, with a glass slide inserted which has been coated with some opaque substance to form a black shadow on the screen equivalent to the size of the picture and around this spot a border of light;" and then it asserts that this is "exactly contrary to the recognized principles of scientific projection of pictures, and, being contrary to those principles, its results are negative."

Since the first motion picture was shown, every exhibitor has sought first of all to provide a dark screen, which no ray of light except that from the projection machine should reach, and has closed every window, door or hole through which light might come, for this purpose. Even then, the screen was never absolutely dark; and to such extent as it failed of being so the picture was imperfect. Mr. Herbst has provided a method whereby that portion of the screen upon which the picture is projected is rendered absolutely black, and has produced an ideal, and as yet the only ideal, projection surface in this important respect; so that the picture is shown where absolutely no light rays whatever except those from the projection machine reach the screen, and has surrounded the picture with a border upon which so strong a light is thrown by the stereopticon as absolutely to cut off and to prevent light rays from other sources striking that portion of the screen on which the picture is projected. So this is "exactly contrary to the recognized principles of scientific projection of pictures," is it? As well dispute the action of radium with reference to heat or of the gyroscope with reference to gravity.

The Index is worried, further, because, as it asserts, "the Herbst process doubles your light bills, for the machine which projects the shadow and border must be operated independently." This is not true. I am operating the two arcs in series, effecting a saving of current of about two-thirds, and using a double dissolver, with the projection machine, employing the combination for projection, for the black spot and surrounding light border on the screen and for announcement or advertising slides, having the dissolving lever separate—practically one machine with two arcs consuming less current than one arc in the projection machine alone operated with rheostat.

Working upon this basis, which provides absolute essentials of scientific projection with a compunying reduction of cost for current, the Herbst process makes possible still further artistic improvement, while with the Rothapfel "daylight" system the limit of possibility has been reached when the ordinary picture is shown with a black border. With the former, the screen around the picture may be painted in gold and other suitable colors in representation of an ornate frame, upon which the light from the stereopticon may be thrown through various colors of gelatine, producing effects of beauty limited only to the artistic ingenuity of the operator and his judgment in selecting colors best calculated to heighten the effect of the picture.

And what about the lighting of the house? Every light in the entire auditorium is burning, without frosted globes or any shading whatever, or any attempt to locate the lamps so that their rays may not strike the screen. In fact, the theater is more brilliantly illuminated than is any other in which the ordinary dramatic representation is given.

And what of the picture itself? It is absolutely bright, clear and sharp in definition, and possesses a stereoscopic depth and softness of tone never before seen, and which I do not believe may be secured by any other method, while the picture viewed from the side shows no distortion of the figures. I stand back of this unqualified statement; and to corroborate me I have the voluntary statements of a large number of managers, practical operators and experts who have seen the picture as projected by me with the Herbst process in the Nelson Theater, Springfield, Mass., and have pronounced it in every respect far superior to any they have ever before seen under any system of projection.

With the Herbst process, as with any other, the operator is, after all, the main factor; and it lies with him either to make its results negative or to produce the most nearly perfect and artistically beautiful picture yet shown in any screen. The ignorant or careless operator may, with the Herbst process, as with any other, project a thoroughly bad picture. The practical and skilled operator, who seeks and studies the scientific and artistic advancement of his profession and aims constantly to improve in his own work, has been provided by Mr. Herbst with the groundwork upon which he may build up results likely to astonish even himself, and which inevitably must inure to the advantage of his employer through public appreciation of the vastly superior character of the picture in every detail of artistic beauty.

I have seen and studied every kind of light-house pictures, I have experimented with them and with ideas of my own, and have found in other films than the Herbst process various points of merit; and the statements here made are based upon actual practical experience with the Herbst process, which, in practical everyday operation, I have demonstrated virtually begins where all others leave off and provides possibilities of scientific and artistic projection not previously offered and capable of further development in the hands of a skilled operator who has at heart the progressive improvement of the picture and the advancement of his own projection, and who does not condemn without personal experience an innovation which happens to conflict with his own pet theories.

Eberhard Schneider's Wonderful Invention.

Single Illuminant Double Dissolving Stereopticon.

On another page, in this issue of the Moving Picture World, will be found a half page announcement of Eberhard Schneider's new and marvelous invention, which will in all probability revolutionize matters relating to the present day projection apparatus. By an ingenious yet simple arrangement, Mr. Schneider has succeeded, after 10 years of experimenting, in producing dissolving pictures of any character, size or distance, with the aid of a single arc light It is difficult to grasp, off hand, just how far-reaching this invention will become. To say that the results Mr. Schneider has obtained in his new invention, are wonderful, scarcely expresses it. Hardly any one who has not seen the machine in operation will believe that a double dissolving stereopticon can be operated with a single arc light; and yet the facts of the case are that the dissolving effect is not only obtained, but is far superior to the effects obtained from the present day mechanism; besides which the great saving of current, in connection with a single lamp house, single illuminant, single rheostat, and, in fact, anything that is double in the present stereopticons, being done away with, in the new invention of Mr. Schneider will certainly cause a more than ordinary amount of interest and inquiry as to the merits of his new machine. Complete catalogues giving full information in reference to this ingenious invention will be cheerfully forwarded to any person desiring one, by communicating with the Eberhard Schneider Company, whose address is given in their advertisement, appearing on another page, in this issue of this magazine.

New England Picture Personalities—No. 3

Joseph L. Roth.

By Henry.

As the third exhibitor to be written of under the heading, "New England Picture Personalities," the World's N. E. representative has chosen Mr. Joseph L. Roth, general manager of the Jolliette and Olympic theaters, Bowdoin Square, Boston, as he is one of our ablest and best known M. P. men in New England.

JOSEPH L. ROTH

Mr. Roth has spent practically his whole lifetime in the theatrical game, breaking into the business at the age of 8, when he was known as the "Phenomenal Boy Tenor." Mr. Roth gained considerable knowledge and experience at B. F. Keith's Boston theater, where he spent 5 years. Mr. Roth came to Keith's as an usher, but in a few months was promoted to the post of special confidential messenger to Mr. Keith. After a short time Mr. Roth was again advanced, and was placed in charge of the information bureau. At the end of his first year at Keith's, Mr. Roth found himself in the responsible position of assistant press representative for the theater. This position was held by Mr. Roth for 4 years.

Shortly after leaving Keith's, Mr. Roth spent some time on the Boston Herald, in the advertising department, and also did considerable road work in vaudeville.

In 1905, Mr. Roth was in charge of the Lake Chauncy Park Theater, Westborough, Mass. While there Mr. Roth drew considerable attention to himself by the able way in which he managed this house.

Mr. W. G. Greene, now the largest renter of independent films in New England, noticed Mr. Roth's ability and engaged him to manage the Medford Opera House, Medford, Mass., during 1906.

While managing the Medford theater Mr. Roth was tempted by a particularly flattering offer made to him by the Boston Electric Vaudeville Company, a corporation at that time building and financing the Jolliette Theater, Boston. Thus it was that Mr. Roth found himself in charge of the second M. P. theater to be built in Boston early in 1907. The Realistic M. P. Co., which is a re-organization of the Boston Electric Vaudeville Co., acquired the Olympic Theater, Bowdoin Square, Boston, from Messrs. Lasky Bros. this fall. Since that time Mr. Roth has been superintending both houses.

Mr. Roth can well be termed the "Unique Boston M. P. manager," as he can rightfully lay claim to several points which no other Boston M. P. man can equal.

Mr. Roth is the only M. P. manager in Boston who never projected a licensed picture in his house. Even when conditions looked especially black for independent, this astute manager stuck to the independent side. This allegiance earned Mr. Roth the sobriquet of "Boston's original independent exhibitor." Judging by the condition of Mr. Roth's theaters, his decision to stick by his convictions is amply justified.

Furthermore, Mr. Roth can lay claim to being the only man managing a Boston M. P. house, who has been with his theater since its opening day; as the other houses have all changed their managers at least once since they were first opened. This fact speaks for itself, and proves that Mr. Roth must be delivering the goods. An untiring worker Mr. Roth is probably the only Boston M. P. manager with no regular "nights off." Mr. Roth is on the job morning, noon and night. Recently, being asked as to whether he ate and slept at his theaters, Mr. Roth replied in the negative, and added that now it had been brought to his attention, he considered the idea worthy of consideration. These claims are amply sufficient to justify the word "unique" being applied to Mr. Roth, but he has another one in his favor. As can be noted from the photograph above, Mr. Roth is certainly "some looker." Hence it is that he is acknowledged by brother managers to be not only the best looking but also the best dressed M. P. manager in Boston. The Olympic Theater, which has been under Mr. Roth's guidance for the last few months, shows his skill and knowledge of the M. P. business. Up to the time the Olympic was taken over by the Realistic Co., the house had never made a creditable showing, but is now doing a successful business, owing to the drastic changes put into effect by the new manager. Both houses are receiving their films from the W. E. Greene Film Exchange. The Jolliette featuring pictures and songs and the Olympic adding vaudeville to the regular bill.

Mr. Roth is the sort of manager that the World commends; running clean, orderly houses, and doing his share for the advancement of the picture.

In a word, Mr. Roth is the type of M. P. manager that makes good—energetic, experienced and upright.

"The Thanhouser Kid" on the Stump.

Marie Eline, "The Thanhouser Kid," conveyed to West Hoboken, N. J., one evening last week and told her admirers among the patrons of Hellich's Theatre that she was really, truly kid and furthermore let them see it. The hall was taxed to its 1,200 capacity by the Hoboekenites who wanted to see Marie as she is, and when the cat said "Good evening" there was a perfect chorus of welcome. The way to her generous reception had been paved in a sense by the running of "Old Curiosity Shop," a dramatic reel and "The Little Fire Chief," a comedy reel, a happy selection of subjects, in that they showed well Marie's wide range of versatility. As a stage setback the youngster essayed an imitation of Fanny Ward and though following a pretentious school act she easily held her own. Manager Kutler of Hellich's paid this tribute to "The Kid's" powers in a letter to the Thanhouser people dated March 27th:

"We wish to extend many thanks for the great attendance at our house last Friday evening, as little Marie was indeed a marvelous drawing card. I never before had as big a house as that evening. The actual attendance records that I have sent Mr. Hellich show the best business the box office could possibly do under our present seating capacity, and this week we advance billing, no circulars, no cards, no lobby display and merely my singer's announcement on the preceding Wednesday and Thursday that 'the Kid' would appear.

Arrangements are now being made whereby Marie may appear at every independent theater in and around New York.

MISTAKEN ADDRESS

In our article of last week in which we called attention of the trade to the entry of the Hudson Electrical Supply Co. into the motion picture field there was a mistaken address given as 40 Hudson Street. We wish to correct that error by giving herewith the proper address, which is 49 Harrison Street, New York City.

Los Angeles.

By Richard V. Spencer.

(Pacific Coast Correspondent of the World.)

Biograph.—The Biograph company have been spending a week in the Malibu country taking sea scenes for a dramatization of the famous Tennyson poem, "Enoch Arden." It is on this beautiful stretch of sea coast that last year they produced their "Unchanging Sea," and their late release "Fisher Folk." While taking one of the sea pictures Sunday, a near tragedy was narrowly averted. The scene in question was taken late in the afternoon. All day the storm clouds had been hanging heavy over the Malibu Mountains, and the surf was running high and treacherous. Mr. Griffith, the director, ordered the company to the beach, where the camera was set up and preparations made to take a surf scene. Passing autoists attracted by the actors' costumes stopped their automobiles and formed a gallery on the sand back of the camera to watch the tree show. Part of the scene business called for the launching of a boat, which was to be rowed beyond the breaker line, then to get into range of the camera and come ashore and join the crew of the boat previously landed. The director gave the signal to launch the boat and the three actors in costume pushed the boat out into the surf and jumped in. Before they could get their oars to work a huge comber swept in, drenching the actors, filling the boat half full of water, and carried it ashore on the crest of the wave. A second launching was ordered and this time the boat managed successfully to get beyond the breakers. In maneuvering to get into camera range the tide carried them rapidly in shore. The oarsman tried to turn the boat bow onto the breakers and come ashore, but before he could succeed in the attempt, a big wave caught the boat upsetting it and rolling it under the comber with its human freight. Actors and spectators ran to their rescue and when the boat came to the surface again one of the men was missing. The boat, a heavy fishing yawl, drifted into shore bottom side up. Willing hands hurriedly turned it up and rescued the man imprisoned beneath. Aside from a mouthful of sand and a quantity of sea water the man was unhurt, and a general laugh ensued at his expense. Therefore, it will be seen from the above that the profession of acting before the camera is not without its perils. This is only one of the score of similar accidents that the writer has witnessed or had called to his attention. A third attempt to take the scene was a success.

Mr. William N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company, and his wife, are among the visitors to the city. Mr. Selig is here to inspect their local studio and to look after the business interests of the company.

Selig.—Mr. Hobart Bosworth and part of the Selig Stock Company have gone up on the Mohave Desert to take a series of Western pictures with a desert atmosphere. Members of the Kalem Company, who have just returned from a similar trip, affirm that there is plenty of "atmosphere" of the hot variety. Apropos of sunburn, it may be mentioned that the Biograph Company's actors are also complainers.

American Film Manufacturing Co.—C. P. Hamilton, an official of the American Film Manufacturing Company, is here on business, to look after the interests of the firm. While here he is a guest of the Westminster Hotel.

War Pictures.—A dispatch from San Diego announces that Harry Reimers, camera man for the Selig Polyscope Company, has gone to Tecate, Mex., for the purpose of taking a series of moving pictures of the Mexican Federal and Revolutionists in action. If he is unsuccessful in finding an engagement to photograph he will take pictures of the troops in camp life and manœuvers. In this he is said to have the consent of the Mexican government, although certain alarmists predict that he will be arrested as a spy. Reimers is a veteran photographer and was in both the Boer-British and Spanish-American wars, so the smell of gunpowder should hold no terror for him. Reimers is said to have secured consent of the United States Government through the navy department to take pictures of the Pacific Coast cruiser squadron when they are engaged in battle practice and other manœuvers.

Kalem.—The local United States officials have warned the Kalem Company to not produce any more stories dealing with the Mexican Revolution. Government officers are said to have visited the studio at Verduga Park and warned the officials of the company.

Selig.—Mr. Boggs, director, and some thirty members of the Selig Company have been working for the past week in San Gabriel Canyon on Western pictures. This is one of the prettiest and most scenic canyons in the Southwest, and the Selig Company are the first to make use of the canyon's beauty photographically.

Los Angeles Exhibitors.

Legislation.—Senator Strobridge's Bill, No. 964, regulating the giving of moving picture shows, passed the Assembly. The presentation of offensive or suggestive pictures is prohibited, and the pictures must be given in light sufficient to reveal the features of those present. The bill has passed the Senate and is now before the Governor for his signature. The Governor will in all probability sign the bill without delay, as it is in line with California city legislation.

Pictures in Prison.—Recently the superintendent of the City Detention Home for wayward children, at Railroad and Main streets, gave a moving picture entertainment for the benefit of the youngsters in the home. During one of the periods of darkness in the big assembly room two boys, Edwin Cox and Raymond Taylor, slipped from the room and made their way to the office, where they secured keys of the outside door and made their escape from the home. Their absence was not discovered until after the close of the entertainment when the lights were turned up. The boys were awaiting trial in the Juvenile Court for minor offences. The superintendent should henceforth be a booster for the daylight screen, which, had one been installed, the boys could not have escaped.

Another Theater Opens.—The Ideal, 340 South Spring Street, opened Saturday night, the 25th, to excellent business. The new theater adjoins the Los Angeles Theater on the south. The house is small, seating only 150, but is very cosy and attractive. Three first and second run independent films are shown, and two illustrated songs. The theater is the only one of moving pictures in the block, and by reason of the fact, they should play to good business with the services they are giving.

Isis.—Messrs. Hogan & Jensen, proprietors of the Isis, have re-opened and installed a new Wurlitzer automatic piano. The firm say that the new music is attracting transient trade.

The New York Theatrical Company, who intended to erect a theater on Broadway opposite Clune's have changed their plans and sold their lease to a mercantile company.

Violating City Ordinance.—Pantage's Vaudeville Theater, adjoining Clune's Broadway, is this week exhibiting a set of posters in flagrant violation of city ordinances. They are advertising the dramatic sketch, "The Hold Up." Lurid red three-sheet posters and feature banners, printed in large type advertise the act in a half-dozen places in the lobby, and on the billboards on the curb line. The Los Angeles ordinances relative to lithographic display forbid the showing of lithographs depicting crimes where weapons are used. In the Pantage's foyer are three life-size illustrations of masked holdup men, guns in hand, and a wealth of printed suggestive detail. As yet, the city authorities have made no effort to forbid such advertising. More than one moving picture theater proprietor has got into trouble for showing less suggestive posters, and whenever a poster of a crime subject is shown, the police department has ordered the moving picture theater proprietor to paste paper strips over the weapons shown on the posters. The city council is now deliberating on passing moving picture theater legislation, and what effect such vaudeville advertising will have on their ultimate decision will not be known until a later date. Members of the city council are sure to see this display for it is in the heart of the business district. At the last session of the council little was said of the poster clause of the impending ordinance. When the matter again comes before the council on April 1st, drastic poster legislation may be expected.

Lease Changes Hands.—E. W. Davis has purchased from F. L. Andrews the lease of the Union Square Theater at the corner of West 24th and Hoover streets. The theater is using licensed service and vaudeville, and is one of the best paying surburban theaters.

General Film Company.—The local exchange of the General Film Company, since gaining control of the licensed service situation, has made sweeping changes in booking arrangements. They have succeeded in abolishing the "tagging" evil that threatened to hurt the business of the ten-cent theaters. Previous to the coming of the General Film Company, local exhibitors had been in the habit of showing four full reels in the five-cent houses. Some of the five-cent houses their big patronage made it possible to use first and second runs. The General officials have now restricted the number to three reels. The Independents, on the other hand, may show just as many reels as they are able to pay for. Last week the Bijou (Independent) ran six reels of first-run pictures to S. R. O. business. Patrons of licensed pictures were not slow to notice the difference in the length of the shows. Whether or not the policy will hurt the Licensed business is an unsettled question, but indications point to the fact that it will, as all the Independent houses report good business.

At the Beaches.—Summer business at the different local beach resorts is on the boom. Last Sunday a summer crowd of over 100,000 people spent the day at the various beaches. Their transportation taxed the local railroad and electric interurban systems to handle the crowd which was unlooked for so early in the season. The various beach theaters and other attractions did a record-breaking business for the day. Hyman's Venice theater is well under way and will open by May 15th, two weeks ahead of schedule time. Clune's Ocean Park Theater on the new million-dollar Fraser pleasure pier is also under way and will be completed by May 30th, in time to participate in the grand beach opening of the summer season. The beach season this year will undoubtedly be the most prosperous ever known. Over $2,000,000 has been spent this year on the West Coast beach attractions, and a score of new and expensive amusement devices are being hurried to completion. The "Rapids" and the Ferris Wheel opened Sunday at Venice and ran to capacity all day and late into the night. The Dragon at Ocean Park is well under way and its forest of timbers will soon be clothed with canvas and paint. The Ocean Park pleasure pier with its two theaters, scenic railway, dance hall, revolving cafe, and other attractions will be in operation by the 30th of May. Money this year is plentiful and this city has a reputation of being a free spenders and amusement lovers; so, from now on, the various theaters and attractions here and at the beaches should play to excellent business.

In the Mississippi Valley.

Jubilation followed the presentation to paraphrase the subtitles in the Rex silhouette, "By the Light of the Moon." When the Royal, Springfield, Ill., showed the film the patrons were undoubtedly pleased with the novelty and it went well despite one or two slap-tick comedy situations. The obstetrical climax offered no ammunition for susceptible prudes.

The contrast between the old and the modern ways of handling clay were shown in moving pictures before the convention of the Iowa Brick & Tile Manufacturers. Films showed the latest methods of kiln operation, loading, handling and packing brick.

To demonstrate exceptional methods in manufacturing E-M-F "30" and Flanders "20" motor cars, the E-M-F Company, of Detroit, Mich., has prepared several thousand feet of moving picture films to be exhibited on an itinerary of 15,000 miles, in charge of Assistant Sales Manager Paul Smith. Beginning with huge piles of crude material, the pictures show automatic machines, foundries, trip-hammers, assembling, testing, racing, hill-climbing and, in fact, every stage in the manufacture and use of the E-M-F and Flanders cars, while a member of the sales force delivers an interesting lecture. Branch-house cities will be visited where the dealers will be brought together, banqueted and shown the moving pictures.

George Fitch, the humorist in his "Burning Whys," asks:

"Why don't they employ singers to sing the illustrated songs in the Looking Theaters?"

And again:

"The moving picture films are getting to be too tragic In one evening recently patrons of Peoria houses were regaled with the accidental shooting of a loving wife, the submission of the husband to the third degree, the attempted suicide of a heart-broken young Italian girl, an Indian massacre and a mine accident in which the hero is shown at the last standing on tiptoe in the flooding mine with the water lapping over his face. And as the film ends abruptly at that point it must be concluded that the water kept right on rising This is too much woe in one gulp. Some light humorous film, such as a view of Senator Lorimer pleading horror-stricken with his friends not to buy any more votes for him —ought to be sandwiched in between the tragedies."

The Lexington Theater Company of Chicago has been incorporated with capital stock of $6,000 to do a general theatrical and amusement business. The incorporators are David S. Eisendrath, Fred S. Kahn and H. Kernan.

Samuel B. Roach, editor of the Kankakee, Ill., Republican and incidentally a leading figure in Illinois politics, is interested in the Court Theater, Kankakee, which is one of the finest photoplay houses in Illinois. As a result the place gets lots of advertising. In refusing to run a certain film the management made the following announcement: "One of the pictures sent to the Court Theater was refused by the management because the sentiment of the picture was, to say the least, somewhat questionable, although it was not intended to be so. The story was of a husband and wife who lived alone in the mountains. They were devotedly attached and when the wife meets with a fatal accident by a fall down a deep canon and begs her husband to end her sufferings, the frantic husband accedes, only to end his own life on her grave a day later. The picture is taken from a real happening of recent date, but the Court Theater management doesn't believe in such grewsome tales, although they may portray the sincerest love and affection. Hence the picture will not be shown. In place of this morbid picture the management will present a beautiful Southern picture."

W. J. Stidham is building an open-air theater at Uvalde and First Avenues, Crystal City, Tex.

Ralph Dawson, of Dixon, Ill., will open a picture show in the opera house at Howard, S. D. about April 15.

Leslie Downey, soloist at the Court Theater, Kankakee, Ill., a moving picture show, will assume the management of a vaudeville house in Sheboygan, Wis. June 1.

Quincy, Ill., has passed an ordinance requiring moving picture shows, where the price of admission is 10 cents or under, to pay a license of $1 a day, $10 a week, $25 for three months or $50 a year.

The Greenville Amusement Company, of Greenville, Tex., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $10,000. The incorporators are S. A. Price, A. B. Correll and H. L. Warren.

The Victor Amusement Company, of Fort Worth, Tex., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $30,000. The incorporators are T. J. Walsh, T. Dillon and R. A. Healy.

Under the impression that the Johnson-Jeffries pictures were being put on at the Dixie Moving Picture Show in Little Rock, Ark., it is said Governor George W. Donaghey entered the place, ordered the patrons to leave and told the management to stop the show. At the time the governor entered the Gotch-Zbysco wrestling pictures were being shown.

The Lincoln Water & Light Company, of Lincoln, Ill., in an attractive quarter page Ad. headed "Why are Picture Shows Brilliantly Lighted" says among other things: "The picture show proprietors light their theater fronts because it pays them, but are they doing the city a service as well? Are they not making the streets of this city more attractive in the evening? Is there not police value in the occasional brilliant front of a picture theater?"

The Joliet Orpheum Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with capital stock of $15,000 to do a general theatrical business. The incorporators are B. W. Cortelyou, J. C. Bliss and H. A. Robinson.

J. W. Smith has opened a moving picture show in the Central Opera House at McHenry, Ill.

Morton P. Harvey, of the Nasawan, North Water Street, Decatur, Ill., put on his picture show in Powers' Opera House while his own photoplay house was being remodeled.

The city council of Fort Worth, Tex., has passed an ordinance regulating the moving picture shows and the character of the show places and persons allowed to attend. It does not require the lighting of the auditorium.

Moving pictures of Yellowstone Park were shown at the Delmore Airdome, St. Louis, to real estate men under the auspices of the Boosters' Club of the Real Estate Exchange. The object was to interest real estate men in the national convention of the association to be held in July at Denver, at which a side trip to the park will be a feature.

The Healey Picture Show, Houston Street, Fort Worth, Tex., recently featured a song, "My Motor Maid," by Mrs. John Swartz, of that city.

The Majestic Amusement Company, of Freeport, Ill., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $3,600 to conduct a general theatrical and amusement enterprise. The incorporators are George W. Graham, Charles W. Baumgarten and Albert Barnes. F. H. M.

Louisville

By G. D. Crain, Jr.

Louisville motion picture show owners express themselves as being highly satisfied with the amount of business done during the past few weeks, although the Lenten season is supposed to have a negative effect upon box-office receipts. The weather has, in the main, been conducive to sight-seeing downtown and it seems that the public has been literally unable to keep away from the exhibitions.

Manager L. J. Dittmar, of the Royal Amusement Company, operating the Majestic Theater on Fourth Avenue near Chestnut Street and the Royal Theater on Broadway near Eighteenth Street in Louisville, says that affairs have been running along excellently at his houses. Mr. Dittmar succeeded in putting across a couple of "scoops" at the Majestic. Last week a series of Mexican War films were run, the first of the kind to appear in Louisville, which proved to be exceedingly popular. At the request of the Kentucky Federation of Women's Clubs, Mr. Dittmar introduced a couple of reels of films on the "Fly Pest," showing by microscopic views the various stages of development of the germ-carriers, thereby materially aiding the work of the Kentucky State Board of Health in campaigning toward the extermination of flies.

William Tapp, house manager of the Royal Theater on the north side of Broadway near Eighteenth Street, says that his house is drawing better crowds every day. The Royal was opened up only about a month ago and bids fair to be one of the most prominent theaters in the city before long.

"Our shows have been drawing fine crowds during the past fortnight or so, in spite of the advent of Lent," said Manager Irvin Simon, of the Princess Amusement Company, which operates the Orpheum, Superba, Casino and Hopkins theaters in Louisville. Within the next month the Princess Company, which has its headquarters in the Hopkins Theater Building at Second and Market streets, will open vaudeville and motion pictures for a summer run at the Gayety Theater, now a burlesque house, on Jefferson Street between Third and Fourth Avenues.

The Broadway Theater, of which Joseph Stuerle is manager, at Shelby Street and Broadway, has added vaudeville attractions to its moving picture program within the past week. The admission rate is still standard at 5 and 10 cents and Mr. Stuerle says that capacity houses are well in evidence.

Louis and Joseph Stuerle, of the Broadway Theater at Shelby Street and Broadway, and Fred Bolle, Henry Reiss and Herman Gocke, of the West Broadway Theater at Eighteenth Street and Broadway, are planning to form a moving picture corporation within the next week or ten days. The syndicate has secured a big lot on the northwest corner of Twenty-Third and Market streets, measuring 100 by 150 feet in dimension, upon which will be erected an airdome of 1,500 seating capacity, within the next month or so. The airdome will be operated during the summer by the company and will probably be converted into a moving picture house next fall.

"Business leaves no room for complaint," said House Manager Reiss, of the new West Broadway Theater at Eighteenth street and Broadway.

Chief of Police H. Watson Lindsey has secured the acquiescence of all picture theater managers in Louisville to a plan whereby all films shown in local houses will be censored by the manager himself before their presentation, even though the reels have been censored at the factory, according to agreement. Chief Lindsey asserts that he recently discovered that pictures of an immoral character, harmful to boys and girls, were being shown in some local theaters, and he secured the cooperation of the "magnates" without any trouble. It is promised that no suggestive films will be shown hereafter in the Gateway City, as the theater managers state without doubt that a clean, high class bill is by far the best business-bringer.

The Underwriters' Realty Company, 510 Paul Jones Building, is having plans drawn for a $30,000 moving picture theater which is to be erected upon property controlled by the company on the south side of Walnut Street between Fifth and Center streets. The site fronts for 160 feet on Walnut Street and extends back for 130 feet, costing $125,000 a few years ago, so that the new theater will represent an investment of $155,000. The structure will be of the most modern design, work upon it beginning in the near future.

Bloomfield & Ratcliff, who operate the Auditorium Theater in Winchester, Ky., recently donated half the proceeds from the night shows for a week to the movement that is now afoot in Winchester to secure a new public hospital for Clark County.

J. M. Robertson recently closed a deal whereby he becomes sole lessee of the Bowling Green Opera House at Bowling Green, Ky. Mr. Robertson is offering legitimate dramatic attractions and is featuring moving picture exhibitions on the afternoons and evenings when "legit" is not billed.

The Columbia Theater, a strictly modern motion picture house, seating about four hundred people, was opened a short time ago at Bowling Green, Ky., by the Columbia Theater Company, with O. C. Phillips as general manager.

A. D. Noe, Jr., manager of the Hotel Madison at Madisonville, Ky., has made arrangements to manage a new motion picture theater called the Princess, in Madisonville. The house is presenting a straight picture bill, the films being furnished from Memphis, Tenn.

Jackson & Orr, of Paris, Tenn., recently opened a new picture theater in Murray, Ky., equipping the Murray Opera House in an up-to-date manner and utilizing a piano and sound effects.

James Garnett has equipped and is now opening a picture show in Pembroke, Ky., with every prospect of future success.

Harry Bleich, who operates the Princess Theater in Hopkinsville, Ky., has secured a lease on the Hopkinsville Airdome for the coming summer and will operate the open-air resort upon an enlarged scale. Improvements are now being made in the airdome which will give greater seating capacity, and Manager Bleich is looking forward to a big season. The Princess will be run in connection with the airdome, and will be well ventilated during the hot summer sessions by a system of fans that is now being installed.

Albert Knoessel, a well known motion picture manager of Western Kentucky, has been engaged by the Lyric Moving Picture Company, of Catlettsburg, Ky., as manager of the Lyric Theater, which was recently opened in Catlettsburg. Floyd S. Chapman, of Huntington, W. Va., has leased the Lyric and is now operating the house on an enlarged scale with every modern accessory.

An interesting demonstration of the value of the motion picture as an educator and a promoter to the success of a salesman was given a short time ago in Memphis, Tenn., when representatives of the Studebaker Automobile Works, of South Bend, Ind., paid a visit to the Tennessee city and showed seventy-five auto dealers, gathered from Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi and Louisiana, just how the Studebaker "buzz wagons" are made in the big plant. The assembled dealers viewed moving picture exhibitions of every section of the factory and saw the construction of a car from the time its blue-print embryo was in the designer's hands until the finished product rolled out for a road test. The devotees of the horn and wheel enjoyed the "show" immensely and voted that they had gained practically as accurate a description from the reels as they would have from a trip through the establishment.

The value of the motion picture as an up-to-date advertising medium is apt to be materially enhancer in the near future, for negotiations are now pending between Charles Stacy, of the Vitagraph Company, of Boston, Mass., and the officials of the Rock Island Railroad, whereby Mr. Stacy is to take some views of Hot Springs, Ark., showing every detail of the famous bath treatment at that place, from the time that the "invalid" arrives until he departs in a perfectly rejuvenated condition. The Rock Island corporation will use numerous reels of the films at free exhibitions in various cities, thereby calculating to increase their passenger traffic to Hot Springs in this manner. Mr. Stacy is now engaged in taking moving pictures of the Brooklyn Baseball Club while it is in training at the Arkansas health resort.

The sale of stock of the Multiplex Phonograph Company, a corporation that will manufacture a patented talking-machine and moving picture machine in Chattanooga, Tenn., has been begun and officers of the new company have been elected. The officers are as follows: D. W. Hughes, president; C. S. Goodwin, vice-president; W. F. Neil, secretary-treasurer, and D. T. Blakey, general manager. A factory is to be established within the next few weeks in Chattanooga and the concern will turn out first the phonographs and later the picture machines and still later picture films. The multiplex phonograph was invented by a resident of Nashville, Tenn., for carrying four, six, eight and twelve records at once and is especially adapted to picture show use. The records are played one after the other without rewinding. In making its picture films, the company will utilize the picturesque scenery about Lookout Mountain and around Chattanooga, later procuring an indoor studio.

The Lookout Amusement Company was recently incorporated in Chattanooga, Tenn., with a capital stock of $32,000 and later developments indicate that three prominent moving picture theaters in Chattanooga consolidated management and ownership through the formation of the company. The Theato, Bonita and Colonial houses are involved and their transfer to the new corporation has already been completed. The officers of the new company are: L. Lewellyn, president; Howell Graham, vice-president and general manager, and J. E. Johnson, Ross Fason and J. T. Lupton as stockholders. Mr. Graham holds a controlling interest in the Lookout concern in return for his transfer of the Theato and his share in the Colonial theaters.

Boston.

A New Theater.

According to positive information the Back Bay, Boston's exclusive residential center, will soon have its first theater. Mr. M. H. Gulesian, a real estate dealer, and formerly manager of the Castle Square Theater, Boston, in co-operation with Mr. William T. Richardson, has negotiated a lease on the Chickering Hall property, near Massachusetts Avenue. The property contains approximately 22,000 feet of land. The plans for the theater, to be called the St. James, have been executed by Messrs. Peabody & Stearns. It is expected that the house will be much wider than is usual in theaters, but of much less depth. The exact location the theater, according to present plans, will be entirely detached from all other structures, and will be the only theater in Boston built in this way. It is expected that 1,800 seats will be installed in this house. The work of erection will start immediately, and will be rushed along very rapidly, according to a statement made to the World's New England representative by Mr. Gulesian. Unless undue delays are encountered, the St. James will be ready for the public by September 15. The policy of the house has not been positively decided on.

B. F. Keith's Theater.

The World's New England representative attended the performance at B. F. Keith's theater, and witnessed the "daylight" moving pictures. This person must not be confounded with the Herbst full light process) can not be very highly regarded. Keith's auditorium was well lighted during the projection of the film—but the light on the reel was poor. The film lacked sharpness and intensity, and a light auditorium hardly compensates for the lack of these features. The reel exhibited was a Vitagraph comedy, "The New Stenographer." Probably no comedy act on the bill received any more hearty laughter than was accorded this picture. Anyone visiting Keith's Boston house a year or so ago could not but be struck by the fact that the cinematograph had not found its way into the hearts of the "upper class." This was owing to the general exodus of those in the orchestra when the picture was projected. This has entirely changed now, and practically four-fifths of those in the auditorium remained for the reel. It is also worthy of note that the theater's programs place the manufacturer's name beside the title of his reel, which is of recent occurrence. Keith's always shows exceptionally good judgment in choosing the single reel to be used each week, and this, in a measure, may account for the ever increasing number of those remaining for the pictures, which always close the performance.

The Neapolitan Camorra Pictures.

Mr. Joseph L. Roth, general manager of the Jolliette and Olympic theaters, Bowdoin Square, poured forth a long wail of lamentation into the ears of the World's New England representative this week. It seems that this astute manager had decided to run the Ambrosio reel, "A Glimpse of Neapolitan Camorra," which was scheduled for release March 29, and to advertise the picture up to the limit, owing to the large amount of Italian patronage at his two theaters. So it happened that on Sunday, March 26, the Jolliette advertised that this picture was soon to be exhibited in the theater. On Monday morning Manager Roth had placed advertising and descriptive matter in his lobby. An order was also placed with his printer for 10,000 fliers or circulars, to be written in Italian. On Tuesday, while arranging the bookings of his two theaters at the W. E. Greene Film Exchange, a telegram arrived stating that the national censor board had refused to approve of the reel. Consequently Manager Roth was forced to take down his advertising matter and pocket a considerable loss of money, as the printers had already struck off 5,000 circulars. Besides the monetary loss involved, this incident is to be deplored because it places the Jolliette in the position of advertising a feature attraction and then not being able to make good that promise to all those who had noticed its forthcoming exhibition. This occurrence brings out the question as to whether or not it is feasible to have pictures placed before the censor board before they are advertised for definite release in the trade papers, etc. By doing this, moving picture theaters would not be put to useless trouble and expense, as was the case of the Jolliette. A picture, at any time, is liable to fall below the requirements of our censor board, and, meantime, enterprising managers throughout the country have spent time and money on advertising the reel. It seems that the manufacturers might give this matter their attention. The Jolliette was not the only house hereabouts that was placed in this false position, as several other theaters had contemplated a similar featuring of the reel.

Real Daylight Pictures.

Boston moving picture managers, practically without exception, are advertising "daylight pictures," illuminated pictures of "perfect screens" and are trying different methods to bring about the desired results. There is only one place in Boston where real daylight pictures can be seen and that favored spot is the exhibiting room of the General Film Company on Washington Street. Two windows, fortunately placed in such a position as not to throw the rays of the sun directly on the screen, give the managers of weekend theaters a chance to watch real daylight pictures while planning the film programs.

General Film Company to Hold Grand Ball.

On Tuesday evening, May 9, 1911, the employees of the General Film Company will hold their first grand ball. The event will take place at Howe Hall, Huntington Avenue. Tickets cost fifty cents. The boys promise that the "blow out" will be worth four times that figure. There is no reason why the ball should not be a great success, as there are a lively and jolly bunch in charge of the various departments of the film company.

Boston Film Rental Company.

Mr. Harry E. Campbell, formerly manager of the Star Theater, and later of the Savoy, is now in charge of the Boston Film Rental Company, an independent film exchange. Mr. Campbell also runs down to Marlboro, Mass., twice weekly to care for the Princess Theater, which he is managing. Mr. Campbell is very well known in the moving picture business and should be able to increase the patronage of the Boston Film Rental Company.

Rhode Island Managers Convene.

When the legislatures of the several New England States convened in 1910, the Massachusetts body easily led the remaining States, as regards freak and unjust bills introduced by its members, with the picture as their basis. In the current legislative sittings, Rhode Island easily wins the laurels from Massachusetts. Several unusually outrageous bills have been recently introduced into the Rhode Island Legislature, which, if enacted into law, would practically kill many moving picture houses. On this account a meeting was held in Providence, R. I., at which the Theatrical Managers' Protective Association, of Rhode Island was formed. The meeting was an unusually large and harmonious one, with practically every city and town of Rhode Island represented. The following officers were elected: Mr. Charles Lovenberg, of Keith's Theater, Providence, president; Mr. A. Spitz, manager of the Empire Theater, Providence, treasurer; Mr. Charles Allen, manager Scenic Theater, Providence, vice-president; Mr. Morris Silver, manager the Star Theater, Pawtucket, secretary. These officers, together with the members, are to be just what their name implies—"protective." The Rhode Island managers showed unusually good judgment in choosing officers for their organization, and the men elected are practically the best in the field.

Large Theater in Portland, Me.

April first saw the opening of one of the largest and most up-to-date moving picture theaters in the country, when the Big Nickel Theater of Portland, Me., threw open its doors. Practically 1,500 people can be seated in the auditorium alone, with a gallery to help out when needed. The policy of the Nickel is a straight show of moving pictures and illustrated songs. Vaudeville may be introduced later on, but not until the straight moving picture show has had a complete tryout. The house is very well provided with exits as eight distinct means of egress have been provided for. Owing to the immense size of the house, special attention was paid to the operating room, in order to insure a clear picture, and the projection is stated to be unusually good for so large a theater.

A Woman as Manager.

Mrs. Florence Gorman adds one more to the list of women theater managers in New England, as she has taken over the Scenic Theater, Fields Corner, Mass. The house is doing well since the new management stepped in. Women seem to be successful as managers of moving picture theaters in New England.

Princess Theater Changes Hands.

Mr. G. L. Whalen has purchased the Princess Theater, South Framingham, Mass., from Warren Church, and will operate the house as a moving picture and vaudeville theater. Harry Goldman is at present managing the house for Mr. Whalen, as the latter is finishing a contract for the Gordon Brothers Amusement Company, of Worcester, Mass., where he is "talking the pictures."

Providence, R. I., is becoming a dangerous place for theatrical managers, owing to the number of bills being offered to the legislature regarding the regulation of theaters. Councilman F. J. Berth offered a resolution on Monday, April 3, to bar out all standing room from the theaters. By this bill, if enacted, no theater will be allowed to hold more people than it has seats for. The newly formed Protective Association, spoken of in these columns, is watching all bills regarding their interests, and is prepared to go before the committees in charge and defend their interests if need be.

New Theater for Woonsocket, R. I.

Manager Lynch opened his new theater devoted to "pop" vaudeville and pictures, at Woonsocket, R. I., on Saturday, April 1. This house is using independent films, from the largest renter of that class of service in New England, the W. E. Greene Film Exchange. The house is well situated and up to date, and should do a successful business.

Waltham, Mass., will have a new theater devoted to pictures and vaudeville, when Mr. F. Wotton opens the Orpheum Theater. Mr. Wotton comes to Waltham from Malden, Mass., where he was operating a moving picture theater.

Managers' Association for Holyoke.

Manager L. G. Grossman, of the Opera House, Holyoke, Mass., has been making some changes in the theater, and the house is looking considerably better, although Mr. Grossman has been in charge of the Opera House since February. Mr. Grossman is trying to form an association of local managers in order to better facilitate the running of competing theaters.

Manager Morrison Leaves New England.

The Scenic Temple, of East Boston, Mass., has lost its former manager, Mr. George Morrison, as he has gone to Buffalo, N. Y., to take charge of a "pop" vaudeville and picture house in that city, owned by Messrs. Michael Mark and A. Brock, who, operating under the name of the Mark-Brock Enterprises, are running a large string of picture and vaudeville theaters.

HENRY.

Washington, D. C.

Manager Lucas, of the Washington Film Exchange, has been visiting New York and other points, leaving J. Boyd Dexter at the head of affairs here. It is just possible that Mr. Lucas will be on the road a good part of the time, in which event Mr. Dexter will be at the helm in Washington, conducting affairs with the same congeniality he was accustomed to do when he had a film service of his own. He has recently returned from a trip through the Carolinas for the purpose of looking over the motion picture situation there. The result was the establishment of a branch independent exchange at Charlotte, N. C., with Harry L. Lucas in charge. Mr. Lucas was formerly with the Sunny South Film Exchange in Savannah, Ga., and will do equally as good work in Charlotte.

Tom Moore, manager of the General Film Exchange, and his wife are still in the South. It seems that he is keeping to his original plan to forget business entirely, for we have not had a word from him as yet. This shows he must be enjoying himself.

A unique film was presented at the banquet recently of the National Automobile Conclave here, in the form of the making of an automobile from start to finish. The local and visiting auto men were highly pleased and somewhat surprised how excellently this industry was shown. Who said the moving pictures were flippant, uneducational, and full of evil tendencies for the young?

Frank Howard, formerly of the College, has re-opened the Mount Vernon and is now managing that theater. He gave the children a treat on April 1 in the form of souvenirs of toys, which brought youngsters from all points to the Mount Vernon. And this was no April fool: they were real toys, some of which were useful and others ornamental. Mr. Howard has introduced on Sundays the singing of four illustrated songs at the same time. The fact that the singers are in different parts of the house makes this very unique and pleasing. The Mount Vernon uses a singer at every show, changing the artist frequently during the week. All this for five cents, with no increase in price for the Sunday bill!

We notice by the advertisement of the National Film Manufacturing & Leasing Co. in the World of April 1, that the Capital has produced a reel entitled, "In the Shadow of the Monument." Mr. Boernstein is entirely ignorant of such a picture, and, supposing the reference to be to our famous Washington Monument, he added, "The recent weather has been too cloudy for the monument to cast a shadow." Is this real business, or is it a joke?

W. H.

BUSINESS CHANGES AND REMOVALS.

The Cincinnati-Buckeye Film Company, a consolidation of the Cincinnati Film Exchange and the Buckeye Film & Projecting Co. (Dayton), announce their removal to more commodious quarters at 422 North High Street, Columbus, Ohio, where they will be in a position to furnish better independent service than ever before.

The Hudson Film Exchange, New York (formerly Harstn's), has again changed hands. Mr. Aiken, of the Western Film Exchange, Milwaukee, has been looking over the ground in the East for some time for a location. He has established temporary quarters at No. 51 E. 19th St. and his first step was to acquire the Hudson and with its business as a nucleus he intends to establish another real live buying independent exchange in New York City.

THE LATEST IN POSTERS.

One of the most artistic posters we have yet seen in the moving picture line has just been prepared by the Champion Film Company in connection with their feature release of April 17th: "With General Stonewall Jackson." It is in four colors, showing a large illustration in center and underneath has a brief synopsis of the picture, with two smaller scenes at each side. The poster is being sent free to all exchanges and independent theaters on request and will prove a handsome and attractive decoration to any lobby. The Champion Company intend to prepare posters in this fine four-color effect for all of their special productions.

Vandora Theater, St. Louis, Mo.

We take pleasure in reproducing herewith a photograph of the Vandora Theater, located at Cherokee Street and Texas Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., operated by the Vandora Amusement Company, Jos. Van Raalte, president, and Rud Koehler, secretary. This pretty house was built especially for the moving picture business, and if you will study the picture closely you will see many points wherein it can be called an ideal picture theater. It is a one-story building, but the ceiling is very high, which is as it should be for moving pictures. This ceiling becomes higher at the other end on account of the floor, which is sloped toward the rear wall. On the side of the theater there is a runway, which also slopes at the same pitch as the theater floor, so that there are no steps for the outgoing crowds to trip upon.

This theater is 50 by 100 inside, and contains 800 of the very best opera chairs procurable. The picture is remarkably large, being 17 by 21 feet, and is projected from an ideal operator's booth, which measures 8 x 12. Think of it, operators! A room to work in 8 x 12. This is a rare thing in the moving picture business to-day, and on this account alone we would say that the builders of this theater knew exactly what they were doing from the start.

The building is faced with red brick, with terra-cotta trimmings. The arches are terra-cotta and white brick, with electric lamps on each of the scallops. There is an electric sign visible; also two flaming arc lamps, which are in accordance with all good usage. If the reader will glance closely at the photograph inside the entrance will be seen very tasty decorations. Some very handsome oil painted panels of Egyptian scenes are visible through the arches, together with some tasty Egyptian fresco work around them. The doors, as will be seen, are large beveled glass plate mirrors, so that everybody entering the house can see themselves as they enter. This is one of the handsomest foyers that has come to our attention in some time, and we wish to call especial attention to it, lest it be lost sight of. There are 300 electric lamps in and around this vestibule and the ticket office.

The electricity for the entire establishment is generated on the premises. The operator's booth is built of concrete, and there are two moving picture machines, one dissolver and one spot light. In the auditorium there have been placed twenty electric fans, and these, with the aid of ten transoms and six large ventilators in the ceiling, play a very important part in the proper ventilation of this truly model theater.

It is a pleasure to gaze on the picture of such a tasty theater as this, and we hope that many more such photographs will come our way. The policy of the Vandora is first-class independent pictures and no vaudeville.

Letters to the Editor

A PLEA FOR COMMON SENSE.

Catlettsburg, Ky., March 27, 1911.

Editor, Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I am very much interested in your educational page, and sincerely hope you will make even stronger efforts in getting the manufacturers to put out more educational films. My theatre has a regular patronage, which is of a good class, and rowdyism is unknown in my place. I have discontinued using illustrated songs, because they are most all trashy. By showing good Independent pictures only, I am making a success of a house that failed three times before I took it.

I wish to register a few complaints with you for the good of the cause. We get too many "Western" pictures. These are objectionable to many for various reasons. We get too many melodramas. All my patrons enjoy good comedy-dramas, so long as they are morally clean. My patronage here is composed of sensible business men and their wives, and a number of them have complained and expressed their intention of not coming any more, if I continue to show pictures of sadness, death and suicide. They also tell me that the majority of the foreign comedies strike them as being extremely silly.

I have managed this house for six months, giving it my full time and attention, and am making what appears to be a permanent success. But I must admit that I am badly handicapped, on account of the similitude in the output of the manufacturers. We want plenty of educational films and less (better none) of these "yellow back" dime novel Western tragedies or dramas.

I am confident that if my patrons would be sure of seeing a good comedy or an interesting educational picture every evening, my place would not accommodate all of them. They all come because they want to enjoy a hearty laugh; they do not come because they want to cry. I love to show a picture that does not meet with the objection of anyone.

Relative to photography: Why cannot the American manufacturers put out films equal to foreign makes; some are very poor. They dance and play hob with the eye; generally out of focus, etc. I take much pride in the way I put pictures on the screen, but it is impossible to put a good one on, with some of the films we get. I am much pleased to note that at least one, the American Film Manufacturing Company, is going in for educational pictures and feel confident they will meet with good success.

Yours very truly,
A. J. WELLMAN, Manager Bijou Theater.

HEALTH LECTURE FILMS WANTED.

Board of Health, Waterford, N. Y., March 31, 1911.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen:—I am greatly interested in the educational field of the motion picture. I have exhibited lantern slides on popular subjects of health in the nearby motion picture theaters during the intervals while the films are being changed since last fall and have exhibited such educational films as I could obtain also.

My slides have created increased interest in public health matters and are well received by the audiences.

I have written today to the General Film Co., as you suggest in your issue of Feb. 4th and write you for any further list of educational films of which you may know.

I believe the use of the motion picture theater by the exhibition of suitable lantern slides and films on popular subjects of health is the greatest advance made in the last decade in the education of the public along sanitary lines.

Any information as to where I might obtain any films on public health matters, particularly milk, water and tuberculosis, would be greatly appreciated.

Very truly yours,
CHARLES S. PRIEST, M. D., Health Officer.

[On April 21st a film entitled, "Boil Your Water," will be issued by Pathe Freres. As an object lesson of the danger of drinking stagnant water it should be of inestimable value. The Edison Company recently issued a film entitled, "The Man Who Learned," a strong demonstration of the dangers lurking in milk received from unsanitary farms. "The Man Who Learned" and "The Red Cross Seal," also by the Edison Company, and "Thou Shalt Not," by the Biograph Company, show the ravages of tuberculosis in unsanitary surroundings. These and other films of special educational value can be purchased from the manufacturer (whose addresses we will furnish) for private or free exhibition. The films can also be rented by the day from film exchanges.—Eds. M. P. W.]

ALASKA PRESENTS OPPORTUNITIES FOR THE M. P. CAMERA.

Dear Sirs:—Inclosed please find $3.50. Renew our subscription and send us one Operators' Handbook. We have been one of your readers for the past year and intend to be one of them so long as you continue your good work. We are quite a way off from you and the moving picture business is not the same as it is in your city or as in most of the cities outside of Alaska. But this cold and frozen country (as it is generally called and looked upon by people that have not been here) will be and is growing and improving in every aspect, and must therefore do the same in the moving picture line. We hope some day to see this country more extensively represented in the films. We have some of the finest and most wonderful scenery in the world. Some pictures of this country could be taken and shown in the States that would surprise everyone that would see them. Most people outside of Alaska are under the impression that we have nothing here but snow and ice. That is entirely wrong. For a country that is so young we can surprise the world. Mining, of course, is at present our principal industry, but we have other things also. We raise vegetables here that can beat anything in your own great state. What do you think of cabbages that will weigh thirty-three pounds to the head? Strawberries, three ounces; celery, four feet high and as crisp and white as any you ever saw. And above all, a people that are as bright and good as the best in the world.

Hoping that this will not tire you and that the Moving Picture World will continue its good work, we remain

Yours respectfully, MARTIN & KOON

CO-OPERATING WITH THE CHURCH.

San Luis, Obispo, Cal., March 25, 1911

Moving Picture World, New York City.

Gentlemen:—I have read your different articles regarding pictures in churches and schools with great interest, and since reading your articles I have set about to do the same thing in my own town and I think every exhibitor should do the same thing as this is the quickest way to get pictures into all the churches and schools.

On March 26th, the Congregational Church will show the film entitled "Pharaoh, or Israel in Egypt." I am furnishing the church free of cost the machine, operator and film. Rev. B. F. Boller wrote the article which I enclose; the article speaks for itself.

Dear Sir:—I have been an exhibitor for 3½ years and used all kinds of music for the picture from a $25 graphophone to a 12 piece orchestra. I think it is an insult to a real musician to ask him to play music to suit a majority of the pictures. A repertoire of two tunes is about all I find necessary. A funeral march for the average drama, with murder, suicide or deathbed scene, and "Who is Kissing Her Now?" for almost 75 per cent. of the silly love stories, with a special sound effect apparatus to represent osculation, worked ad libitum. Yours truly, E. W. L.

Gentlemen:—Operators' and Managers' Handbook was duly received. Every operator and manager should have one. The M. P. OPERATORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION BALL.

On April 21st, at Arlington Hall, 19-21 St. Mark's Place, the Moving Picture Operators' Benevolent Association will give a ball which it is expected will be very largely attended, more than 1,000 tickets having already been sold. The purpose of the affair is to increase the sick benefit fund and place it on a practical basis. All income goes to this fund. A souvenir journal is in course of preparation in which advertising space is for sale at reasonable figures. This journal will be distributed all over the country, advertising thereon will be of real value. The cause certainly is a worthy one, and should receive hearty support from all. Call on Robert Goldblatt, care B. W. Borkowitz, 210 East 14th St., New York City.

"Bill," the burglar, enters Mr. Tilson's house at the psychological moment. Little Florence mistakes him for Uncle John from the West. "Bill" makes an ideal uncle; and, when Mrs. Tilson, the police and the real uncle arrive on the scene, his nerve makes him master of the situation. But Mr. Tilson returns home at the psychological moment and the climax is delightfully capped.

Short Circuits.—Galveston, Tex., writes: "I want to ask you whether or not an ordinary incandescent globe is a short circuit? I have a bet up on this particular proposition. We have asked two electricians in this city and they have both said an electric light globe is not a short circuit. I am, however, not satisfied and we have agreed to leave the matter to you. The bet is $10."

I think, Galveston, you had better call that bet off, because it is not a fair wager, for this reason: Technically, an incandescent globe is not a short circuit; practically, however, anything which connects wires of opposite polarity is a short circuit. Ordinarily anything that connects the two wires of opposite polarity without resistance interposed is called a short circuit. In an incandescent lamp there is resistance which limits the flow of current. I should call an incandescent globe a limited short circuit between the two wires, and that is what it really amounts to. Therefore, the man who bet that an incandescent lamp was a short circuit is both right and wrong. All bets are off.

Trouble.—Wilmington, N. C., writes as follows: "We are having some trouble with our two new Edison latest type machines. It seems that the film goes in and out of focus. I have watched this closely, and looking into the gate of the machine you can see that the film does not ride on the aperture plate as it ought. Could it be that the factory failed to make the aperture plate true?"

Yes, Wilmington, it is quite possible that the aperture plate was not made true. It is, however, quite improbable that that is the fact, and I think you must look elsewhere for the trouble. When the film is not in the machine, examine closely and see if the tension springs rest squarely on the tracks. If they do not, then move them so that they do. See that the tension springs are not shifting from one side to the other, by reason of the screws holding them being loose. It is possible also that the fault lies in the film itself. We had several letters concerning this particular difficulty some six months ago and it was discovered that the fault might lay in several things, one of which was the film being kept in an excessively warm, dry place; the remedy being to remoisten the film by unwinding it in a moisture can and leaving it there for from thirty minutes to a couple of hours, according to the condition of the film and the temperature of the can. If your aperture plate tracks are worn, which is quite possible as you have had the machine for a "few months," the fault probably lies in the worn aperture plate and you should put on a new one at once. Sometimes the springs will wear a hollow in the center of the tracks on the aperture plate, or else wear two hollows with a hump between. This has a very decided tendency to buckle the film as it passes the aperature, thus throwing it in and out of focus. If you do not locate the difficulty in one of these things, kindly communicate with me further.

Sensitive Eyes.—Texas (no town or name given) writes: "I am a close observer of the Trouble Department and have some troubles of my own. What is the cause of the trembling or palsied motion of objects moving from right to left, or vice versa, on the screen when the title or other stationary objects are perfectly still? I have two machines, one a two-pin remodeled to one-pin, Edison; the other a new machine. Both give same results."

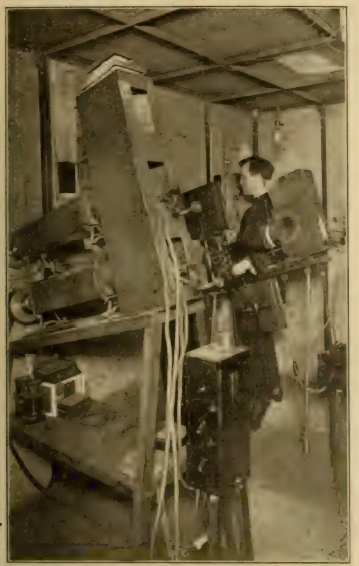
In the first place, Texas, you did not sign your letter, and I must again caution correspondents to sign their letters, else no attention will be paid to them. Neither signature nor name of town will be published if the writer so requests, but all letters must be signed. That is the absolute rule of this department. Please observe it if you wish to receive answers to your letters. I think what Texas means is the jerky movement of any objects moving straight across the screen at tolerably rapid speed. To understand this one must consider that moving pictures are not really "moving" pictures at all, but merely a succession of snapshot photographs taken at the rate of about sixteen to the second and displayed on the screen at approximately the same rate. If an object is moving straight across the screen at rapid speed, photographs are being taken of it at the above rate; and sometimes it moves such a great distance between photographs, rapidly as they are taken, the eye discerns the movement, which thus becomes jerky. It is a fact that once in a great while we find a man or a woman with eyes peculiarly sensitive to this movement; in other words, a man or woman with very little of what is called persistence of vision, and such a one will catch this movement in almost anything that moves across the screen. I think possibly Texas is one of those people, blessed (or cursed) with a lack of what we call the persistence of vision.

Fitchburg, Mass.—Mr. H. J. Jackson, manager Bijou writes: "Herewith are two pictures which may be of interest to you. One is of my doorman and ushers. You will see that I am still a believer in uniformed employees. I think that the dinner suits that the boys are wearing have been the most satisfactory uniforms that we have yet had. They are no more expensive than any good uniforms would be and a laundry bill of a dollar a week assures clean linen."

"The other picture is the interior of our booth and will give you a very good idea of the construction demanded by the Massachusetts District Police. The machines are Powers No. 5 and a dissolver made in our Springfield repair house. The enclosed switches shown are most satisfactory and do away with the possibility of igniting film through sparks. I might mention in passing that our operator, F. J. Charlton, has been in this house for the past four years and is yet to have his first serious breakdown."

"Hoping that the World continues in its present good methods."

Four years without serious trouble speaks of careful painstaking work on the part of Mr. Charlton. Glad to have more such pictures of operating rooms. That wall-hole shutter system looks like the real thing.

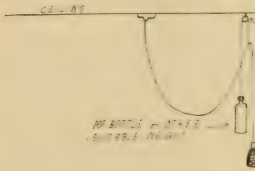


Five Dollars per Week.—From a certain Iowa town comes the following: "I have been operating for approximately three years. Have not had occasion to write you concerning projection troubles as yet, but I have another trouble now, as follows: my boss read the Five Dollars per Week article in last week's World. I make five dollars, board and room. He put two and two together and concluded it was I who wrote you. Will you kindly tell where the letter in question really came from?"

No, Iowa, I cannot do that, but will say that it came from a city far to the west of Iowa. Had you sent your address, full name, I mean, I would have mailed you the letter. Your boss must have added two and three, instead of two and two, this time. Five dollars, board and room is not five dollars per week. Here in New York we would figure it as about $14. It would be much less than that in your town, however.

A Puzzle.—E. L. Mason, Indiana Harbor, Ind., writes: "Being the operator of one of the best theatres in this city, I am, of course, striving to produce the best projection. There is one thing, however, which has puzzled me greatly of late, and although I have tried in every way, I cannot get rid of it. I am using a No. 6 F. F. lens on a No. 5 Powers machine. As soon as the machine is started a large circle of light appears on the walls and ceiling of the theater. Our lens is in perfect condition. We have had it examined, but still I cannot find what is the trouble. I have a copy of Handbook and would not be without it. Have had a cloth cover made for it and hope to keep it in good condition for years to come; since any questions I could have asked I have, nine times out of ten, found answered somewhere within its pages. I have what seems a fairly good idea for handling my operating room incandescent lamps, which is shown in the accompanying sketch. It is very handy, as I can hook it down in place when I want it, and when I am through it raises up out of the way. I trust you will aid me in solving my little problem, as before set forth."

I am not at all certain, Indiana Harbor, as to what your difficulty is. I would suggest this method of finding out. Move your finger around near the machine until by watching the light on the ceiling you find that the tip of your finger is obstructing it; or, in other words, has entered the circle of light. By watching the shadow on the ceiling, move your finger back to the source of light and that will determine where it comes from. I am not at all sure, but I am a little inclined to believe that the trouble is due to the inside of your objective lens barrel being polished instead of painted black, as it should be. Look and see if this is the case. I presume your lens is put together right, else you would have said something about being unable to get a sharp focus on your picture. However, I will say that the convex side of all lenses in the objective should be towards the screen. If any of the department readers have experienced similar trouble to this and have found and remedied the difficulty, we would be glad to hear from them. The lamp stunt is most excellent. I suppose by "No. 6 F. F." you really mean a 6-inch F. F. lens.



Small Light Plant.—Mr. C. E. Lindall, Orangeburg, S. C., writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for the Handbook. I have just received from home a whole bundle of Worlds and all other business is suspended until I have read them through. I am an old-timer and also am one of those who coined a little money running 'May Irwin's Kiss' over the old Spool-Bank. I am still on the road, playing two-night stands in small towns and week stands in towns of 5,000 and upwards. In January 28th number an inquiry asked concerning a small dynamo. I am using one which I had made to order and am more than pleased with it. It is a 3-hp gasoline engine and dynamo all in one piece, weighing only 400 pounds. I carry it comfortably in my touring car, together with all the rest of the outfit, and one other man. The field of the dynamo is inside the rim of the engine flywheel; the commutator being on the shaft, an unusual combination you will readily see. It is 110-volt D.C. I have no ammeter with me, but it lights 30 16-c.p. lights brilliantly, which goes to show I get about 15 amperes. When I start my arc light the incandescent gets very dim and the engine slows down about 15 per cent., but I speed it up and the light is absolutely steady. My average throw is about 45 feet, with a 13-foot picture. Now, that looks as though I am not getting 15 amperes at my arc unless the dynamo generates more when running slower, which does not seem possible. This much is sure anyhow: I get a beautiful light. Here at Orangeburg, at Aiken and at Summerville, where we played week stands, I used the house lights, the A.C., partly to save wire on the outfit, but mainly for comparison. Every time on returning to our dynamo the difference in its favor was instantly apparent. We return to our dynamo next week and I have secured some small items and will now find out approximately what I am getting when running the arc. I have had the dynamo only about two months and it is not for sale, but if your inquiries will write me at my winter address, 245 Main Street, Norfolk, Va. I will tell him where to get one made at an expense of $35. I expect to be in New York on my way home the last of April and would be delighted if you could spare time for a little chat. If that other trade paper found an occasional mistake or some of your deductions as invited discussion in a friendly way, it would be a benefit to us all, but its vindictive cuss on you have only served to make more friends for you."

Well, Neighbor Lindall, I certainly had one good laugh when I read your letter. Reading without an ammeter, of course, or much of anything else sounded like old times, when the only rule was "deliver the goods." Nowadays the electrical departments require this and require that and require the other, and by the time you are done meeting their requirements (which, mind you, I do not mean to say or insinuate are either wrong or unreasonable) you almost feel like putting the whole business under a glass cover. In the old days we used any old thing we could get by with, and we generally "got by," too, without any trouble at all. I can see by your letter that you are an experienced road man and you are hereby cordially invited to take dinner at my home in New York City the first evening you arrive, or any other evening which will suit your convenience. As to the dynamo, if you really are getting good light out of 15 amperes, throwing a 13-foot picture, you are doing wonders. I should like to know what size carbons you are using. I imagine that if you could put an ammeter on the circuit you would find your machine to be delivering considerable more than that. Your incandescent lamps are possibly burning considerable above c.p. What you say about the other paper is quite true. Friendly discussion—that is, provided it is really friendly—would be of benefit to us all. I say "us," you will observe, because I never have and never expect to get too old to learn, and haven't much use for the fellow who imagines he knows everything there is to know. Such discussion, however, while it would be welcomed on my part, is an impossibility by reason of the very vindictiveness of which you have spoken. So malignant has the sheet to which you refer become that I have ceased to pay any attention whatsoever to anything it says or does.

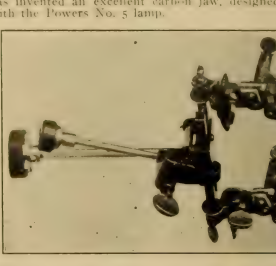
Another from Northland.—Mr. Alfred Y. Craig, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, contributes the following: "Your reply to my inquiry noted in recent issue (page 593, March 18th), and I wish to thank you for same. I have received many valuable suggestions from your Handbook. I am still, however, unable to obtain proper light. The current is 60-cycle, 110-volt A.C.; the voltage hardly appreciably varies. We use Electra ½ cored carbons, upper and lower. I have no means of telling accurately how much current we pull, but should think between 30 and 35 amperes, though I have known 30-ampere plugs to blow in a few nights, and the 35-ampere fuses now in use never blow. My main trouble is that I cannot maintain a clear white light. It will be bright enough one moment, but will invariably die down, and no matter how the carbons are moved will not become bright again for some moments. In fact, the bright moments are much less frequent than the dull ones and sometimes the whole reel will be quite dull. I find that the light is better when I burn a long arc long enough to show a purple streak at the top of the spot."

The trouble is, I think, plain enough now, Wolfville, since you have sent the added information. There is no earthly use in trying to get good light with 30 amperes of A.C. It is a thing that simply cannot be done, particularly through a rheostat. I still do not know what size picture you are projecting, but assuming it to be from 12 to 15 feet wide, you should pull at least 40 and better, 50 amperes of current. There is one bare possibility, however, though it is only a possibility, and that is, if the plant generates high tension current which comes to you from a transformer out on the pole, there may be something wrong with the transformer. If that is the case, however, your incandescent lights would also dim down at the same time your arc does. I think this is all I can offer you at this time.

Likes the World.—Mr. H. H. Greenfield, Esterhazy, Sask., Can., writes: "Enclosed find subscription to the World. It is a splendid paper which we would not like to be without. My brother and I are on the road. We have a new motiograph, purchased last year, and some very good films, including, 'The Huguenot,' 'Italy's Marvelous Cavalry,' the 'Burning of Rome' and a good assortment of really funny half-reel comedies. We give them five reels and six illustrated songs, the music being supplied by a large Victor gramaphone. The show goes well and we have received many compliments, but we do not find that there is much in it, as the expenses are high. I have often intended writing to tell you what a help I have found the Moving Picture World to be. I wonder if your correspondents who are troubled with condenser breakage have ever tried putting a disc of annealed glass inside of the condenser holder so that it comes next the light. I have always used one and have never broken a condenser yet. They can be obtained from the Kline Optical Company, I believe. We wish the World and yourself the very best of good luck and prosperity for the future."

You are up against the proposition many road men have been introduced to. The income looks mighty nice, and the thing figures out on paper all right, but when you get out on the road it is a dollar here, five there and ten yonder; and at the end of the season you find you have handled a whole lot of money, but mighty little of it has stuck to your fingers or reached the inside compartment of your wallet. As to that annealed glass stunt, I will back that proposition up myself, only you will have to tell us where the right kind of glass can be had. I tried to procure it of the Kline Optical Company more than two years ago. They had handled some, but found it unsatisfactory. They said that while one batch of it would be all right the next lot would break as soon as placed in heat and they, therefore, did not handle it any longer. If you can get good annealed glass it will undoubtedly do the work.

New Carbon Jaw.—Mr. Edward Bendl, of New York City, has invented an excellent carbon jaw, designed to be used with the Powers No. 5 lamp.



The editor of this department has examined this article and it is very good, indeed; the main point being that the mica insulation is not in the knuckle-joint and the whole jaw can be taken away and a new one put in its place in less than one minute, merely by looseing one screw. The insulation is never disturbed. It is therefore permanent and never gives any bother. The article is, as I have said, excellent. The address of the inventor is 555 8th Ave., New York.

Curtain Coating.—Mr. A. A. Shilkett, owner and manager Odeon Theater, Lyons, Kas., writes: "Find enclosed check for another year's subscription to the World. Here is something for the department, if you wish to use it. I have been experimenting on a curtain coating for two years and know it will do the work. It is made as follows: Set up 2x4 studding to receive lath, and plaster, with ordinary plaster, after which run on a finishing coat making an absolutely straight and smooth surface. It requires a mechanic to do this part of the work. After it is thoroughly dried, put on a coat of flat white paint and then in twenty-four hours put on another. When this is thoroughly dry, take one pint of aluminum, or silver bronze, and mix it into a liquid with banana oil and turpentine, half-and-half. Apply this mixture with a soft camel's hair brush about two inches wide, brushing up and down all the while to avoid brush marks. I have used such a screen for almost six months and many who have seen it thought we had a mirror screen. I would not advise anyone to put up this screen if they run film that contains much rain, as it shows the rain much plainer than the ordinary curtain. If any of the readers try this, I wish they would report results."

We are obliged to you, Neighbor Shilkett, for the directions given concerning the screen. I think there is no doubt but what those wishing a high class screen will do well to install one after your directions. If properly done, the result certainly ought to be excellent.

Do not Understand.—Rhode Island (name of town withheld) writes: "I received the Handbook last week and am very much pleased with it. Will you please inform me how I can get a good light on 55 volts A.C. or D.C.? Suppose I connect two 110-volt rheostats in multiple, what voltage am I going to get across the arc? Two 110-volt, 40 amperes A. C. or D.C. rheostats in multiple, 110 colts each—what voltage and amperage shall I get across the arc?"

You are considerably mixed in your dates, Rhode Island, and I cannot figure out what you are driving at. If you mean what amperage and voltage would there be at the arc with two 110-volt, 40-ampere rheostats hitched in multiple, it requires no figuring to ascertain the amperage. Two 40-ampere 110-volt rheostats hitched in multiple on 110 volts will give approximately 80 amperes, though not exactly that. The voltage across the arc varies with length of the arc and amperage and could only be accurately determined by the use of a volt meter. Forty-five volts is taken as the standard drop of a D.C. projection arc; that is to say, we figure that the voltage at the arc is 45. This, however, is not accurate.

CHICAGO SONG SLIDE EXCHANGE

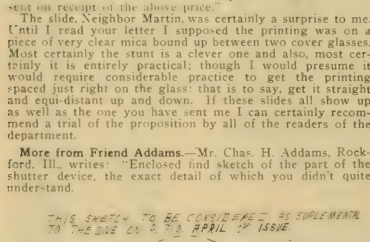
I do not want to take up space figuring out something when I do not know just what it is you want. Make yourself more clear and I will try to give you the information you desire.

Clever Stunt.—Mr. James Martin Spencer, Ia., contributes the following: "Before giving detail of advertising slides as I promised in my last letter, let me say that if all operators will very carefully read your letter to Denver, Colo., in the department March 25th, relative to condensers, ninety per cent. of them will be benefited. I feel safe in saying that few machines are placed on the market with any adequate arrangement for spacing condensers. I for one have followed your advice to Denver and the result has been wonderful. And now for the ad. slides, the neatest, cheapest and best ever made. The cost is comparatively nothing since every manager or operator who is doing any advertising has access to a printer's shop. Set up the advertising matter you wish to throw on the screen, using 16 or 18 point type. Be careful not to overrun the size of the slide mat. Leave the type in the stick, placing a strong rubber band around it to hold it, and ink the type with a proof-press roller. Now, take a clean rubber roller, such as is used for inking proof-galleys (by clean I mean a new roller, or one in good condition, that all ink has been removed from) and roll this clean roller over the type, which has been previously inked. You will find you have the inked impression of the type transferred to the clean roller. Next lay your slide glass on a smooth surface and run the roller over it and the printing will be found to be transferred to the glass. Use a mat and bind up with a cover glass in the ordinary way. You will have a far neater slide than any that can be written with pen and ink. The glass may be cleaned off at any time and used again and again for other ads. Any line or block cut, which is small enough, may be readily transferred to the glass as above. Enclosed is a slide made according to directions. I have been using this form of slide for two years and have received many favorable comments upon them from other exhibitors. Printers laughed at the idea when I told them of it, but are willing to be convinced and are greatly surprised when shown how simple and effective the transferring process really is. I also have a preparation for transferring any picture in colors, or even plain, ordinary type matter, to glass, but this formula I hold at $3 for sample bottle and formula for same. Complete directions will be sent on receipt of the above price."

The slide, Neighbor Martin, was certainly a surprise to me. Until I read your letter I supposed the printing was on a piece of very clear mica bound up between two cover glasses. Most certainly the stunt is a clever one and also, most certainly it is entirely practical; though I would presume it would require considerable practice to get the printing spaced just right on the glass; that is to say, get it straight and equi-distant up and down. If these slides all show up as well as the one you have sent me I can certainly recommend a trial of the proposition by all of the readers of the department.

More from Friend Addams.—Mr. Chas. H. Addams, Rockford, Ill., writes: "Enclosed find sketch of the part of the shutter device, the exact detail of which you didn't quite understand.



The front end next to shutter doesn't move, the other end only moves three-quarters of an inch, which is the length of the travel. Now, the idler gear and the gear on the main spindle pull apart a very little at the extreme travel both ways, but there isn't enough lost motion to notice and there is none anywhere else. The bar is 5 inches long and a swing of three-quarters of an inch at one end doesn't cause much play between the two gears. By holding the flywheel with one hand and moving the shutter with the other, there isn't over a quarter of an inch of play at the outer edge of the shutter at any point of the travel of the frame up. I see Mr. H. S. Klink, Canton, O., speaks of the circuit breaker. He says he set his breaker at 100 amperes and every time he struck an arc, out would go the breaker. Tell me why. My circuit breaker is set at 70 amperes and I have two lamps on one side, each burning 25 amperes, by meter test. I can light one lamp and freeze carbons of the other one and the breaker holds, but if I freeze both at the same time the breaker will come out. Now, what I want to know is why should his 40 ampere fuses hold when his 100-ampere breaker would kick out? I believe there must have been something wrong with his breaker. I wish to thank you very much for what you said about my shutter, and I may have something else for you soon."

If your shutter moves only one-quarter of an inch at its outer diameter, it would indicate a minimum of lost motion. The ordinary outside shutter moves from five-eighths to as much as one inch on most machines. I did not realize the bar was as long as that. Of course, with a bar 5 inches long and only ¾ inch travel, there really would not be much pulling apart of the gears. As to the circuit breaker; when you bring your carbons together you cut out the resistance of the arc and, the rheostat being cold, you have a heavy rush of current for an instant, or until the arc has been pulled. Just how much would, of course, depend on the rheostat, but I should say it would be at least one-third more than the normal amperage used. Taking a 25-ampere rheostat as example, the total resistance of the circuit (neglecting the slight line resistance) is made up as follows: rheostat, 2 3/5 ohms; arc, 1 4/5 ohms. When the carbons are brought together the arc resistance, of course, is eliminated, and we would leave a resistance of only 2 3/5 ohms to oppose the pressure of 110 volts. Dividing the pressure by ohms, we have a flow of about 42 amperes, or considerably more than one-third increase. It ought to follow from this that the circuit breaker would have to be set higher than the normal amperage in about the proportion above indicated.

He Wants to Know.—New York City wastes one whole postal card on the following: "(1) How can I get an operator's job in this city? (2) Can I get one if I am not a citizen? (3) What trouble should I expect with D.C.? I have always worked with A.C."

(1) By "operator's card" I suppose you mean a license and not a union card." You will have to make application to the proper officials at the department of water supply, gas and electricity of the City of New York, in Park Row Building, opposite the main postoffice. (2) You cannot secure a license in the City of New York unless you are an American citizen, except that, as I understand it, Italian citizens are not amendable to the law in that respect, being protected by an old treaty between the United States and Italy. (3) You would not expect any trouble at all with D.C., as it is very, very much easier to handle than alternating. I would suggest you secure a copy of the managers' and operators' Handbook for sale by the Moving Picture World, which will give you information as to the method of setting carbons for alternating and direct current; as well as many other things; price $1.50 postpaid.

From the Land of Anthracite.—Forest City, Pa., name withheld by request, writes: "I have noticed several letters from operators regarding the number of amperes required to put up a good, brilliant light. One operator in particular, suggests that it is impossible to get good light with less than 40 amperes. I must beg to differ with our friend on that point. It is quite possible to get good light with less than 40 amperes. In support of that statement I enclose a piece of non-inflammable film that you may note the result after exactly two seconds exposure to high light, and I am using 25 amperes only. I am running a motiograph, 1909 model, throwing a 10x12 picture at 50 feet."

We are glad, indeed, to hear from you Forest City, and to know that you are active down in that particular neck of the woods. The number of amperes required varies with the size of picture. I may say, however, that I have never been able to secure what I consider high class projection light with 25 amperes. Nevertheless, I do not propose to say that nobody else can. The sample of film shows that your light is intense and it is quite possible to get an intense light with 25 amperes. My experience, however, has been that with low amperage it is almost an impossibility to at all times maintain a clear screen. Shadows will creep in, whereas with high amperage, I experience no trouble whatever in that respect and can run steadily for hours without ever a sign of shadow at any point of the screen. Using 40 to 45 amperes, I will undertake to run a machine for three hours with a clear field; that is to say, without any film in the machine; and never, in all that time, have a shadow on the screen which the eye can detect. And I will tell you right now, my dear boy, you cannot do that with 25 amperes; or at least, if you can, you would have to show it to me. You doubtless are able to get very good illumination on a 12 ft. picture with 25 amperes by very careful handling of your light; you also, no doubt can produce very good results. But it doesn't at all follow that you could not produce better results with more amperes and—there you are. Now, please do not think that I am handing you any sort of a roast, for I am not. I would welcome discussion from various operators as to the amperage they have found best under different conditions, both alternating and direct.

Condenser Trouble.—Camden, N. J., writes: "Please find enclosel $1.50 for Handbook. Will you kindly advise me as to what size condensers should be used for a 14-foot picture on a 43-foot throw, Powers No. 8 Cameragraph, 110 volt A.C. 60-cycle current, through a coil: Electra 5½ ohms. I get a clear round spot in the center of screen which fades out towards the sides. I have tried condensers from different companies and told them my throw and size of picture. Have changed my projection lens, have tried everything I know of, but cannot get a clear, sharp light except in the center."

I should say the trouble was in your projection lens, but you say you have changed that. Absolutely the only thing I know or can imagine is that you are not using amperage enough. You should use two 6½ or one 6½ and one 7½ condensing lenses, whichever gives best results. It surely isn't possible that you have got your lamp house pulled back so far that you are on the back focus. If this is true, the spot on the gate would be surrounded by a maltese cross shaped, blue bordered light. I hardly think, however, this would be possible. Are you sure that the curtain itself is all right? If any of our readers have encountered such an experience as this we shall be glad to hear from them.

Scientific American Reviews Handbook.—Scientific American, March 25, 1911, has the following to say concerning the Handbook: "Motion Picture Handbook, by F. H. Richardson, New York: In this age of the motion pictures, such a handbook as this will not lack for readers. It tells everything which the would-be operator ought to know, and some things which the full-fledged operator should be familiar with, but, judging from results, is not. The source of the light, the wiring, resistance devices, lenses, carbons, the film, the various makes of projectors, all these are subjects of vital importance in the skillful manipulation of the motion picture machine. Managers may also turn these pages with benefit, not only because managers should know something of the art on which their business depends, but also because the final chapter appeals especially to them, its heads being the selection of a theater location, employees, advertising, film service, tickets and vaudeville."

A New Carbon Clamp.

Mr C. B. Kleine, 19 E. 21st Street, New York City, who is one of the oldest of New York's dealers in optical and other goods pertaining to projection, has invented a new carbon clamp of decided merit. The clamp is neatly and substantially made, and is not at all cumbersome. The weak points in most of the existing carbon arms seem to have been altogether overcome in Mr. Kleine's invention. The insulation is accomplished in such a manner as to be practically indestructible and to present a minimum danger of grounding. The carbon clamp is of the square box type with very thick walls, the carbon being clamped in place by a heavy set-screw. The contact between the carbon and the metal is excellent. The arrangement for tilting the carbons is simple and effective, while the arrangement for connecting the wire is very good indeed, and different from anything which has heretofore been brought to our notice. With such an arm as this, breakage will be reduced to a minimum, if not entirely obviated, and, in case anything does go wrong, the arm can be taken off and a new one installed in its place by simply removing the two screws, neither one of which is at all likely to stick in the metal; a fault very common with most carbon arms. The metal itself is bronze, the screws and clamp nuts being of steel. Altogether, Mr Kleine is to be congratulated on his ability to place on the market so simple and effective a device.

Lexington, Ky.—A new picture house will be opened here in June on the site of the present Noah's Ark Building, which is the best location in the city. The structure will cost between $10,000 and $15,000 and will be modern in every respect. The program will be pictures exclusively, with illustrated songs. The theater will be named the Colonial, and will have a seating capacity of 400, and will be under the management of Mr. John B. Elliott.

LICENSED.

"April Fool" (Edison).—A children's film, admirably acted by children. In it the old April Fool jokes which children have played upon each other from time immemorial are reproduced with natural settings and acted so naturally that they seem almost as though the actual scenes were transpiring before the audience. The scenes where the boy is pleading for his kiss will recall many pleasant memories of the halcyon days of childhood. The producers are to be commended for bringing out such an altogether pleasing film.

"Family Troubles" (Gaumont).—A domestic tale representing a husband and wife as each thinking the other was devoting too much attention to some one else. These misunderstandings are righted and all goes well.

"Billy's Valentine" (Vitagraph).—A comedy representing the difficulty into which a young man is plunged by the small sister of his sweetheart, who substitutes other and less attractive articles for an elaborate valentine and a bunch of flowers. The culprit confesses her part in the matter and the young man is forgiven.

"Getting His Own Back" (Essanay).—A comedy romance in which a pair of convict's trousers play an important part in inducing the young man's father to consent to his marrying an actress. The mix-up regarding the trousers, their transfer from one to another until they appear on the objecting father and his arrest as the escaped convict, are all factors in the hilarity. Eventually the young people are permitted to marry.

"Lost—a Baby" (Essanay).—A comedy, presenting the difficulties that arose from the action of a clerk who hid a baby under the counter when the mother was chasing boys that stole the carriage. Around this is built a series of somewhat exciting incidents, including the arrest of the innocent proprietor of the store on the charge of stealing the baby. But the tangle is eventually straightened out and all is well.

"His Image in the Water" (Gaumont).—A love story of December and May. The glimpse of his wrinkled face mirrored in the water is a potent influence in causing an old man to relinquish a girl to her younger lover and at the same time give them a handsome present.

"The Hero Track Walker" (Kalem).—A melo-drama showing the results of a man's plan to secure money. The girl supposed he was going to blow up the bridge and came to prevent it, but the man's real scheme was to hurl the cartridge fuse away before the dynamite exploded and then pose as a hero. The girl did the rescue act but she let the man get the credit and also herself. Like many other stories this is somewhat improbable, but it develops a degree of interest that pleases the audience.

"Athaliah" (Pathe).—An elaborate Biblical subject of double interest now because toward the middle of April it is in the international Sunday school lessons. It is a scene in the history of Judah when the nation has tired of its idolatrous queen, Athaliah, who has murdered all of the heirs to the throne, as she supposes. They crown little Joash, who has been preserved by the high priest while the soldiers kill the queen in the streets. The story is taken from the account in Second Kings of the stamping out of idolatry in Judah. It is an elaborate production in every sense and is sumptuously staged. The settings and costuming are made historically correct, or according to the conclusions of the best modern Biblical scholars. This picture is well worth while and it might be made an important portion of the church services for April. The representation in this graphic form of these scenes which have been made prominent in the Sunday school lessons would do much to impress upon the minds of children and others what actually occurred in those times. Whether it is wise or not is a question much better decided by others. The fact that these pictures have been produced with fidelity to the original so far as is known, the costuming and settings afford a more graphic understanding of the actual conditions than is possible by means of description. These pictures make the Biblical narratives real. The people seem to live and move. The legendary impression disappears and in its place comes the strength of actuality that cannot be forgotten. This picture deserves commendation for the excellence of its mechanical effects and the timeliness of its release.

"The Inherited Taint" (Vitagraph).—A story based upon the popular belief that a taste for liquor can be inherited. It shows the young man as falling once, but saved through sanitarium treatment, and finally triumphant over his weakness in the love of a young woman. While the story is simple the interest in it is increased by the suggestions it makes and the questions it raises. Some will dispute the accuracy of its conclusions, while others will be equally certain that its presentation of the conditions which exist in cases like this are accurate and should be considered as a sort of sermon against the use of liquor, especially by one who may be unfortunate enough to have the inherited taste.

"The Spanish Gypsy" (Biograph).—A love story with the scenes laid in the picturesque gypsy camps which are always attractive. Here is love, intense hate, jealousy and all the rest of it shown with consummate understanding. But when the girl sees her recreant lover blind and helpless she forgets her desire for vengeance and willingly sacrifices herself to care for him through life. The film is a transcript of life as it often is. There are such episodes in some lives and some hearts will respond as the heart of this gypsy girl responded to the man's helplessness. To that extent, therefore, the picture represents what is best, as well as what is worst, in human nature. It makes a deep impression upon an audience.

"When Women Strike" (Lubin).—A comedy representing how a man cured his wife of going on strike by installing a French maid in his home while his wife was out. When she discovers what he has done she is very contrite. The maid is dismissed and peace rules once more in the household. The story is told with the animation which characterizes Lubin comedies.

"The Warrant for Red Rube" (Melies).—A story of how a bad man was too much for a number of deputies, but was captured by the sheriff disguised as a tenderfoot. The setting is Western and less exaggerated than some. The story is well told and has a degree of interest which holds the attention of the audience throughout. Probably they do not stop to argue the question of probability. The picture tells the story well and the denouement is what might reasonably be expected. Hence their analysis of the realities of the story is not close. It is both thrilling and amusing, even if improbable in some parts.

"1861" (Selig).—One of Selig's excellent war stories. The dangers and difficulties which beset the soldier are well depicted and suggested, but there is a touch of humanity that is sufficient to overcome any impression of the spirit of destruction when the Blue and the Gray meet after the soldier in gray is wounded and he sends back the picture to the old home by the Union solider. War stories are always interesting and Selig has released some of the best of them. This one is as good as the others and holds the audience from beginning to the end. A special interest seems to attach to any picture which represents the work of a spy, or of a soldier sent through the enemy's lines on a desperate mission. While much the same scenes must necessarily be depicted in war pictures, there is an atmosphere about some that is different, and this is one of the different ones.

"Across the Plains" (Essanay).—A question will be raised upon seeing this film—whether it is quite the thing to accept the fact as here set forth that a girl driving a prairie schooner can hold her against Indians on horseback. If the photoplay is looked upon as an accurate description of life of course this scene must be considered too unreal to be included. If, however, the story of the picture is to be considered as the principal feature, then this incident assists in holding interest. It must be admitted that the average audience will enjoy the thrill which this scene affords without analyzing the possibilities of it too closely. The fight at the shack is not improbable. In fact, the same thing has been done a good many times before, while the appearance of the ranchmen and the beating off of the Indians are but incidents which have been many times repeated. That an audience will be pleased with this picture is certain. The improbability of the thrilling race in the first scenes will not mar the enjoyment of the story excepting in a few people.

"The Secret of the Forest" (Gaumont).—A beautifully photographed picture, it presents numerous unusually picturesque scenes. The story itself is not quite clear, but the love tale interwoven gives it sufficient heart interest to hold the attention of an audience.

"Tribulations of Jiggers" (Gaumont).—The comedian purchased a new hat which creates all sorts of disturbances and performs curious stunts in spite of its owner's frantic efforts to prevent. When it goes through a keyhole it reaches the acme of strange behavior for a hat.

"Their Mother" (Pathe).—A story of two brothers, their love for the same girl and other incidents which befell them in their lives, ends in the narrow escape of one from lynching. The story is well told, but the question will arise as to whether it is worth while. The best part is the closing scene where the mother's face is smiling down upon them in a vision.

"Fred Sato and His Dog" (Pathe).—This film exhibits some of the interesting tricks which Sato teaches his dog to perform. One of the greatest of dog trainers, this picture reproduces in satisfactory form some of his most remarkable tricks.

"A Republican Marriage" (Vitagraph).—An elaborate picture, the scenes of which are laid in France during the contest between the classes and the masses; it tells the love story of a countess and a man of the people, ending in their journeys to the guillotine together. As a vehicle for conveying the impression of intense human passion this picture has an interest which might not otherwise attach to it. This disturbance in France, which had such remarkable influence upon the world, is really little understood by the people of this country and episodes taken from it are somewhat blind in their allusions. Everyone can understand human passion, but the differences which exist between various classes of society as represented here are not always so plain. The staging is sumptuous and the acting reaches heights of dramatic power in places.

"Jim, the Mule Boy" (Edison).—A picture that will attract unusual attention because of the fact that it depicts a coal mine far down in the earth, with an explosion and a rescue party. The heroic work of the mule boy in protecting the owner's son and his reward make a somewhat melo-dramatic story that imparts a few thrills, but the principal interest will be the underground scenes. Care has been used to make these scenes accurate and the audience can sit in comfort, see the interior of a coal mine and form some conception of the dangers accompanying its operation.

"The Lass Who Couldn't Forget" (Kalem).—A love story, with the interference of a city woman to take the country lover away from his fisher maiden. After years of waiting he returns and finds her still true to him. The story is not above the ordinary, but because it deals with heart emotions possesses a certain degree of interest that attracts the average audience.

"Dr. Charcot's Trip Toward the South Pole" (Urban).—A series of interesting views which may serve to change the average person's impression of the frozen oceans. For example, probably few ever imagined the ice-filled seas in such a vigorous motion as is portrayed here. The sea of ice will take on a new meaning when viewed in this light. There are many other interesting scenes which will interest and instruct. Dr. Charcot was a French explorer who made the trip some years ago.

"The Cormorants" (Urban).—An educational film representing how the Ainos, a primitive Japanese people, train cormorants to catch fish for them. It pictures a strange people engaged in a strange occupation. The photography is clear as is the outdoor work in all of Urban's pictures, and the novelty of the subject excites unusual interest.

"A Fatal Resemblance" (Pathe).—The story of a man arrested because he resembled someone else, his imprisonment, years of insanity, release, cure and attempt to kill his own son. It is a story that might well happen, and has excellent dramatic quality.

"Between Two Fires" (Edison).—An elaborately worked out film depicting an episode supposed to have occurred during the Franco-Prussian war. It is interesting because it suggests graphically some of the problems which confronted people in that memorable conflict. The scenery is good and some of the pictures about the chateau have a quality which makes them interesting merely as pictures, apart from any connection they may have with the story. The dilemma of the girl is a study which will please, while her final determination to make a clean breast of the situation relieves all of whatever difficulty her previous duplicity may have caused. The love story gives the film heart interest and the pictorial quality, with the suggestion of war, combine to heighten it.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Bachelor's Old Maid" (Champion).—A love story, telling in half humorous fashion how a pair of young lovers tricked the girl's uncle into giving his consent to their marriage, and at the same time entangled him in a net from which he could not escape. As the picture closes it is made plainly evident that there will be two weddings instead of one in the near future. It is a lively story, well told and photographed, and keeps the audience in good humor.

"The Truth" (Nestor).—A picture which will arouse the sympathy of the audience for the young wife left alone to care for her child because of the imprisonment of her husband on a false charge of forgery. Her struggles to make a living are heroic, yet pathetic, and are drawn closely to life. Then the outraged church committee calls upon the clergyman who befriended her for an explanation. They are drawn true, too. The closing scene, the little family reunited with the holier-than-thou committee peering shamefacedly through the curtains at them, is a fitting ending to a picture calculated to rouse the deepest sympathies.

"A Glimpse of Neapolitan Camorra" (Ambrosio).—An excellent travelog, with viewpoints well selected and the mechanical work well done. It will add to any program.

"Pallid Hues in Clouded Skies" (Reliance).—The feeling as this picture closes is indescribable. A man locked in a trunk, a woman in a locked room, unable to open the trunk or herself to escape from the room and the room burning, that is the closing scene. The others show the woman hiding her lover in the trunk and struggling frantically with her husband to prevent his opening it, finally forcing him through the door at the muzzle of a revolver. The effect upon the audience is almost as great as though they saw an actual fire. Perhaps the horrors of the recent holocaust in New York were so fresh that the influence was deeply felt. Few scenes have ever appeared upon the motion picture screen more horrible than this as the trunk rocks with the imprisoned man's struggles to escape and the woman sinks overcome with the heat and the increasing smoke. It would be difficult to imagine anything more horrible unless the auto de fe of the inquisition were reproduced in all its realism. Perhaps there are some who like this sort of thing, but it seems like going backward.

"A Package of Trouble" (Solax).—A semi-humorous story of a mixup in which a package of money and a package of stockings, very much alike, cause no end of difficulty and disturbance. But after many nervous thrills the package of money turns up safe in the place where the stockings were supposed to be.

"The Greed of Gain" (Lux).—A sermon against the greed for money which sometimes wrecks lives, this picture is no agreeable discussion of the time worn theme. Quite the contrary. It shows a murder, when the son pushes his father into the water and drowns him, and two violent deaths, for the son and his wife are drowned in the same place a year later. Meanwhile the actors of the sin and his wife are seen growing hard and greedy under the influence of the father's gold. The film may be interesting as showing a psychological phenomenon, but is hardly a pleasant subject for a motion picture.

"He Wanted a Hoop" (Lux).—A comedy depicting the calamities which befell a young fellow who wanted a hoop and appropriated everything that would roll much to the annoyance of those who entered into his thefts and his own discomfiture which comes in the end.

"The Mill of the Gods" (Solax).—A story of love and jealousy, which involves an innocent man on a charge of theft. Before the nefarious plan can be brought to a head the plotter is fatally injured and sends for the accused man and confesses his part in the scheme. All is made right. While the picture may present to some degree a certain type of human emotion there is, perhaps, more to be said for it upon the score of emphasizing anew the truth that retribution usually follows the commission of any such act as this. The story is well told and the photography is generally clear and satisfactory.

"Silas Marner" (Thanhouser).—George Eliot's name is on the screen. The theme is the disillusion of Marner who believes that gold is everything, but comes later through the loss of his hoard and the interposition of the child of a girl who—he brings up as his daughter—to understand that love and not gold is the principal thing in life. The picture follows the main incidents of the story closely and the characterizations are well performed. It is an acceptable addition to the notable films of this type which this company has released.

"Her Mother's Fiance" (Yankee).—A tale of how a girl supplanting her mother in the affections of a count. It is a side-light upon the oft-told tale of love, presenting anew the superior attractiveness of a girl as compared with an older woman. The widow was obliged to console herself with a son-in-law rather than with a husband. The scene showing the count and the girl cast upon a desert island has the appearance of comedy, though it may well be considered anything but comedy for the unfortunates who suffer.

"As Ye Sow" (Rex).—A serious attempt to depict some of the consequences of youthful folly. It is heedless to undertake a discussion of the question. It is as old as the world and no matter what methods of prevention have been suggested nothing has ever been devised which will assuage the sorrows and heartaches which accompany the sin here shown. It is unusual, though not impossible, that a lawful wife should do what this one is shown as doing. That she took the girl to her heart makes an excellent closing for a picture of this type, but it is to be feared that such occurrences in real life are too rare to be ever considered as possibilities.

"So Shall Ye Reap" (Imp).—Seen with the Rex film "As Ye Sow," mentioned elsewhere, this one presents a different view and one which perhaps is more in keeping with the usages of society. In this instance it is the woman who suffers, and that is as life goes. It is generally the woman who suffers for her folly; the man goes free. After years this mother is reunited with her daughter, but a priest intervenes and prevents the mother making herself known. She is commended to the nuns for consolation. Little can be said about such a film. Undoubtedly it presents a true view of the consequences which usually follow sinning. The sympathy of the audience will be aroused for the unfortunate woman, yet possibly had she returned in a different way, showing less indications of a continuation of a sinful life, the priest would have relented and allowed her to meet her daughter. This possibility adds to the interesting complications and develops in the minds of the audience questions which will make the film linger long in the memory.

"Osteopathy" (American).—A comedy that will keep the audience busy laughing throughout its length.

"Two Girls" (American).—A comedy presenting the difficulties experienced by a gentleman who falls in love with both his stenographers. The means he takes to choose between them furnishes fun for the audience from beginning to end.

"A Victim of His Double" (Great Northern).—An interesting detective story, it has a number of thrilling moments, beginning with the locking of the detective in a trunk to which is attached an infernal machine actuated by clockwork and ending with an exciting race between a motor car and a train, with the motor car victorious. The theft of a diamond tiara is adroitly accomplished which but for the tell-tale suggestion of a cigarette would scarcely have been discovered so quickly. When the tiara is finally in the possession of the count the picture has a happy ending as he presents it to his wife. The story is clear and its unity is plainly apparent to the audience. The photography is quite up to the standard of the Great Northern people. Managers will make no mistake in including this film in their programs.

"Foolshead Goes to a Cock Fight" (Itala).—Another film shows this popular comedian performing numerous original stunts for the amusement of his large circle of admirers. It may be that all sorts of faults can be pointed out in these "Foolshead" films. Their improbability and impossibility being among the most important, but the average audience seems to accept them as they come. The films are enjoyed and apparently the more absurd the performances the more the audience likes the pictures. It would be difficult to say anything else. It is scarcely right to commend these films, as they violate even common sense. The fact remains, nevertheless, that they are popular and that the average audience will applaud them and ask for more.

"Cupid's Monkey-Wrench" (Powers).—A story of love and adventure. The young man does duty as a plumber and eventuallly wins the girl who mistook him and set him to work. The question may be raised as to how it happens that a supposed country hotel like this comes to be fitted with plumbing of the character indicated. Maybe this does not spoil the story, yet its presence brings other incongruous things, which picture makers permit at present. The speedy engagement might be proof of the fact that the plumber did his work well and received adequate remuneration for his important services.

"The Pantaloon Skirt" (Powers).—A comedy based upon the harem skirt. It does not lessen the fun any to discover that a young man is posing in one as a model. The happenings are fast and furious and afford sport enough to keep the audience roaring throughout the running of the film.

"A Western Ruse" (Powers).—The story of how a girl tricked a highwayman into returning to where he left a money box he had taken from an express driver. She helps her lover, the driver, and captures the highwayman by the same move.

"The Imposter" (Thanhouser).—A domestic story beginning in the Civil War where a girl commended to a cousin in the North by her dying father almost loses her chance for a home through the machinations of an impostor, who takes advantage of an injury to the girl to go North and claim the cousin's protection. Happily the plot is discovered and the girl comes into her own. There is nothing particularly dramatic about the picture, yet it is a leaf from what might occur in any life and therefore holds the interest of the audience throughout.

The Stolen Necklace (Nestor).—A pleasing story, logically constructed and clearly told. The picture shows some beautiful interiors and gives a peep into the mysteries of the underworld. Flawless photography and clever acting.

KIDNAPPING SCENE.

The last we saw of Fred Belcher he was up around Madison Square Garden trying to kidnap "Kid" Jarvis, one of Barnum & Bailey's clowns, and "shanghai" him into the moving picture business.

A look of joy overspreads the face of the poor creature, and Reddy, the crook, is quickly lost in his mother's arms. Kneeling beside her he tells of his futile effort to secure work. It is time to take her medicine and Reddy rises to get it, only to discover that the bottle is empty. Reddy takes up the bottle to get it refilled. Left alone, she examines the parcel and to her amazement, it discloses a dark lantern, black mask and jimmy. The shock is too great. She reels feebly to the bed, on which she falls, just as Reddy is entering the door. He approaches the bed, raises the form of his mother in his arms, kisses her lips in an effort to revive her. At this juncture a young woman appears upon the scene, benefited by her timely intervention Reddy resolves to devote his life to reformation. He secures a position through her timely aid, and starts in a life of honest effort. In an evil moment he meets his former associates and again falls into evil ways, through a trap that is made for him. While in the act of forcing the safe, he and his evil companions are surprised by the occupant of the house, who proves to be the charitable young woman who came to his aid when he most needed a friend.

A shot is fired by the leader. Reddy, recognizing the intended victim, jumps between her and her assailant and receives the bullet intended for her. Reddy is nursed back to life and again starts on an honorable and upright path.

CUPID'S POCKETBOOK.—A young and pretty girl is honorably loved and wooed by a young man, but the disparity in their social positions is the serious stumbling block to the consummation of their life's happiness.

On one of his calls the persistent lover finds an opportunity of placing a sum of money, which he knows is sadly needed for necessities, in the girl's pocketbook, but is prevented from restoring the book to her by the unexpected entrance to the room. He conceals the book in his overcoat pocket until a more fitting occasion presents itself. He is obliged to leave the house without having found such an opportunity, and on the way to his own home drops the book on the street and is quite unaware of his loss until the following morning.

The book is found and picked up by an old lawyer, who realizes, when he has examined its contents, that its loss must be a serious one to its owner. He advertises in the morning papers for a claimant. When their loss is discovered consternation naturally suggests the advertising columns of the daily paper, and each in turn supplies for the lost article. Being unable to give an accurate description of the contents of the pocketbook, the lawyer becomes suspicious and labors under the impression that he has unearthed a clever pair of crooks. He looks them together in his ante-room and telephones for police aid. A plain clothes man is sent over to arrest the two desperate criminals. Before the officer arrives, the individuals, in each other's arms, having arrived at a perfect understanding.

BUNGALOW CRAZE.—The four wives of four indulgent and patient husbands are bitten by the "bungalow bug" and contract the bungalow fever. The husbands, following the usual course, succumb, by contact, are also stricken. The wives have daily conferences, at which they exhibit their plans and discuss local topics.

The husbands, too, unknown to each other and to their wives, each determines to give his wife as a surprise a bungalow.

A dashing, rich widow, preparing to go abroad for a protracted sojourn, wishing the use of some of her property before she goes, moves into one of her own houses in a quiet little street, where the usual costumers, auto outfits, etc., are looked upon with suspicion by the modest, unpretending residents of the neighborhood.

The dashing widow advertises her suburban bungalow. The advertisement meets the gaze of the husbands and each one of the four makes haste to surreptitiously visit the comely widow.

In an effort to make a sale, the husbands separately are requested to call on the widow, with a view to arranging the price.

Each in turn is told that they are seen entering the home of the widow and departing mysteriously in her sumptuous car to view the property.

The husbands, each in turn seen by the wives, and a series of complications ensue, which are funny.

JIMMY MINDS THE BABY.—One afternoon father and mother confided the baby to Jimmy's care and set off for the matinee, with explicit instructions that their first born attend the baby with his life. The push cart rolled along, propelled by Jimmy, to the stage door of the very theater where father and mother were watching the show.

The second act was in progress. The property man was having a slight altercation with the stage manager regarding a rag child which the heroine must perforce carry on the stage and suffer in a snowstorm made of paper. Jimmy, loitering near the stage door, was easy prey for the property man, who gave him a twenty-five cents and a promise in the wings to watch the show. Heroine enters with child, little dreaming of opposite side of stage. Heroine exclaims, "My husband!" He scorns her; she pleads; he is heartless. The wife then presents the baby and exclaims, "For the sake of our child." The cruel husband takes the child, throws it in a snow-drift and leaves wife to her fate. Just about this time father and mother recognize their youngest born, leap on the stage and save him from the paper snow. Father sees Jimmy in the entrance. Father exits. Jimmy is placed across father's knee in the traditional way, and warmed up, just because father is bigger than Jimmy.

THE STAMPEDE.—Jose Almedo is a cattle thief. Marie, his wife, endeavors to assist him. Jose and his band plan to run off some cattle belonging to a rancher. Marie goes to warn them, carrying her little girl. Nellie, in her desperate, she struggles across the range but is in the path of the cattle which are being pursued by the thieves. There is a stampede. Bigelo, Hendrick, a ranger to her Maker, she lies down with her child beside her. The affrighted cattle sweep on, over her. Marie is trampled to death but the child is unharmed.

Years elapse and Nellie has grown to be a woman. She is riding one day with the son of the rancher and becomes lost from him. She is captured by the band of Jose, who has not forsaken his life of crime. She is taken to a cabin and held for ransom. Jose intimidates Nellie and is struck by her beauty. Becoming bolder, he makes improper advances only to discover by a locket she wears that she is his daughter.

Parental love triumphs and he bids the girl go. Left alone Jesse is stricken with remorse and fear. Realizing that he will pay the penalty with his life—which is worthless to him, he deliberately goes to the window, thrusts his body out and is shot by the guard and falls dead.

RESIGNATION.—Ned Arling, a prisoner in the penitentiary, sits moodily in his cell, bitter at the world, a broken man, prematurely aged. He rails at his fate and then dreams of the events which sent him to a felon's cell. Auditors should get the film to be cognizant of Ned's dream. It is a very interesting and moral one. However, Ned awakens; smiles, and is resigned to his fate. He had saved the honor of his mother.

THE HERO.—Maude is a hero-worshipper. She loves Artie all right, but he is not just her ideal. She has her dream shattered when Artie evinces cowardice over a trivial matter and Maude is indignant. She tells him to get out and do things. Artie plans a coup by bribing a prize fighter to allow him to beat him up. He makes the affair entirely too realistic and the "pug" turns in and wallops him good and plenty. Artie is once more in disgrace but not out of the running. He has another brilliant idea, and to plan is to execute.

He visits the home of Maude disguised as a burglar and robs her of her jewels. Quickly changing his attire, he appears in his proper person and the girl tells him of her loss, being terrified. By one of quick change—thanks to a costumer, Artie chases the supposed burglar about the place and finally ends it by presenting to Maude her jewels and the outer garments of the burglar as proof of his bravery and prowess just as her parents return from the opera and share in his glory.

Artie has made it good and strong by shooting a hole through his hat and Maude is satisfied that he is a real man. She throws herself into his arms, radiantly happy that she has discovered her ideal, a hero who has covered himself with glory.

OLD HOME WEEK.—John Hepburn was raised in a little country village, and went to the city to seek his fortune. His relatives were dead, and he had quarreled with his childhood sweetheart, somehow Jayville rather passed out of his mind.

Years later, when he was one of New York's millionaires, it was recalled to his mind by reading an item to the effect that Jayville was to have an "Old Home Week," on which occasion roving sons of the village were expected to gather and renew old friendships. The article also mentioned incidentally that the village could boast of no millionaires among those who had gone out to seek fame and fortune.

But Hepburn was in the millionaire class, and he determined to show his old townsmen that he had not forgotten them. He wanted them to believe that they loved him for himself alone, and that the greed of gold could find no lodging in their sturdy natures. So he hid all evidence of wealth, and went down, to all appearances, a poor man, who had battled with life and had not achieved much success.

Things did not turn out as he had expected. His shabby clothes caused unfavorable comment, and everywhere he went he was shunned and snubbed. The only person who greeted him cordially was his old sweetheart, and the love of childhood was revived.

After a time, the villagers began to take notice of Hepburn. There was a reward offered for the capture of a noted burglar, and it was decided, by unanimous vote, that Hepburn was the man wanted. So he was promptly arrested, and as the village had no jail, was locked up in a barn, and there was a sign over the door reading "Welcome," which made the first time that the village's richest son had received any attention.

The girl promptly freed him, for the country constables pay little attention to prisoners after they lock them up. And the boy returns to the city, with the girl's promise that she will wed him as soon as he says the word.

He and she went promptly. The girl meets him time in his life, while the rich boy is thoroughly happy and gives the peanuts the twirl of their lather the old tree on which are carved their initials, and they are married. Then they start off on their wedding trip in his auto.

The machine, when it draws up at the railroad depot, causes the villagers to gape. Their surprise is intensified when their former townsman, utterly ignoring them, tacks a sign up on the side of the depot. And their grief cannot be expressed when they read the sign. For by explains, in a few vigorous words, that he has bought the railroad and that after the current day, trains would not stop at Jayville. If the villagers had been good, they might have been presented with a library. As it is, all they have is the privilege of seeing trains go by and never stop. And the principal fun at a country station is watching the trains stop.

VELVET and RAGS.—A wealthy young physician, a widower, lives in a beautiful mansion with his only child, a boy of seven. The doctor's practice is exacting, and despite his great love for the boy, he is necessarily forced to entrust him to servants, who, while not cruel, are naturally neglectful and indifferent.

Like all children of his age little Paul has dreams of the future. He does not want to be a milkman or a pirate, but his ambition is to run a peanut stand, and that the jolly little urchin does.

While walking in the park one day, his nurse permits him to wander away while she flirts with a policeman. And then Paul's dreams are realized, for he finds a peanut wagon, presided over by a delightfully dirty little boy who, from Paul's standpoint, should be the happiest child in the world. But, strange to say, he isn't.

Paul admires the roaster, and the other boy admires Paul's fine clothes. Childlike, they agree to swap. The poor boy dons fine linen for the first time.

But trouble quickly follows. The neglectful nurse, missing her charge, suddenly appears, grabs the well dressed child, and hails him off. It is a good joke for Paul, but when the drunken owner of the stand appears, and shakes his little boy" laughter gives way to tears.

The two youngsters look much alike, and for the time neither guardian senses the substitution. The poor boy in the rich home is scared to death and very uncomfortable, his eyes pop being the fact that there is no astonishing amount of food. The rich boy finds that peanut vendors have brutal ways, and he decides to run away. He fails at first, but finally gets out of the house and in the pathway those behind him.

The boy, through terror and the pathway he runs for is half stupefied with liquor, fall to notice that they have run directly into a part of the road where a blast is being set off. The man is killed and no one notices him. The child is injured and taken to a hospital, where he is cared for by a sweet faced nurse. There the startling physician calls and recognizes his own child who in his thought was safe at home.

The turmoil in the meantime has discovered the substitution, but is afraid to tell, hoping that she can recover her lost charge before the matter is found out. But her efforts are unavailing and she is turned out by the indignant father. The rich little boy and the hospital nurse intercede for the poor little chap, and the doctor finds a place in his home for him, while the nurse, who has won the hearts of both children, agrees to act as housekeeper for the home that needs the gold ing hand of a loving, self-sacrificing woman. So perhaps cupid entered the house at the same time as the poor little friendless boy, who knows?

A MIDNIGHT ADVENTURE.—John Tilson had not been home since his brother Howard's marriage, but now business called him there and Howard hurried from the office to advise his wife and small daughter that John might drop in upon them at any hour, cautioning them at the time not to be surprised at his rough Western appearance. So impressed was little Florence at her father's description of Uncle John that when she heard the burglar, Bill Hendy, in the sitting room, via revolver and slouch hat quite fitted the child's idea of a Westerner. The burglar was therefore almost taken off his feet by having the two Miss Smiths him as Uncle John. However a scream from the real Uncle which Florence handed him from the table explained matters, and Bill decided to carry out the deception. Placing the child on a chair he made her remain quiet if she wanted a free box of candy, and straightway fell to work upon the safe.

Little had given the maid an evening off and Howard had been called out on a hurry call, for the little girl had dropped one of Bill's keys, she could not sleep and was now locked in the burglar and Florence furthermore she was able to say quickly to the Hendy door without betraying her presence, but as she opened the door her eyes met those of Bill Hendy, who had been guessing the best strategy that to Bill had cut the wires, he recalled his language and Effie mistaking him for the burglar's pal, that he was aware. There he throwing a vase through the window and she also notified Miss Smiths on telephone for the police.

When they arrived, however, Bill, backed up

DOG AND WOLF.—While the old surgeon is visiting a patient, his maid, walking in the garden, notices indications that someone has recently climbed the wall. She is frightened, and tells her misgivings to the old surgeon, and sends her off to bed, bidding her not to worry, for his faithful dog Black is always at hand to defend him.

The surgeon leisurely lights his pipe and settles himself to his easy-chair, preparatory to enjoying his evening paper, after a fatiguing day. His dog Black, however shows signs of restlessness, and at last the master, having confidence in the dog's instinct, is certain that something is wrong. He takes a lantern, calls his dog, and goes out to investigate. Almost immediately Black makes a dash for some nearby shrubbery, and when the surgeon reaches the spot, he finds that a tramp is being savagely attacked by the dog. Seeing the agony of the victim's face he calls the dog off, and takes the man into his study, feeling for him only as a doctor feels for a patient. With all tenderness the surgeon dresses the wounds, while the man gazes about him with the expression of an entrapped beast. * * * his gaze finally rests upon the plenteous viands upon the table, and his eyes take on a ravenous look. The kind old gentleman talks graciously to the vagabond, telling him he must have lost his way, and inviting him next time to knock at the door, and not climb the wall. The tramp's heart is touched by such kindness, which causes him to weep, for the man he would have wronged has shown him courtesy, and given him food, the old surgeon is thus full sure, as he accompanies the tramp to the door, that he has helped him back to a better life.

JERUSALEM AND THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.—After viewing the town of Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, we visit in succession the curious Moslem and Hebrew Burial Places, the Tombs of Zacchias, Abraham and Absalom, the Wall of Lamentation, the Lepers' Quarters, The Holy Sepulchre, etc., etc. The film ends with a most interesting scene of the Pilgrims accomplishing the Way of the Cross. An interesting series of views of the Sacred City and its surroundings, with a modern touch as a finale.

CHAMPION.

WITH STONEWALL JACKSON.—The pride of the Kosgroves of Virginia is indeed gratified beyond measure when General "Stonewall" Jackson and his staff accepts the proffered hospitality so effusively tendered by them.

The young and only son of Widow Kosgrove has enlisted and is about to join his company when the General takes a new flag from the hands of his mother, sister and wife, and presents it to the young husband as a memorial of trust.

With a light heart and joyous tread, the pride of Kosgrove Manor marches away with the army. Heavy service is encountered and at the terrible slaughter at Henry House, the deafening din of the cannon's roar, the proximity of the bursting shells from the enemy's works, the deadly havoc wrought and the loss of life utterly unnerve and terrify the lad, who deserts the field at the height of battle and skulks home.

Against the unavailing protests of his family, the boy will not return, and to preserve the untarnished name of Kosgrove, his beautiful young wife dons a uniform and musket and regains the regiment in time to march with them to Winchester, Va. Desperate fighting ensues, and the Blues capture an important position. Their commander mounts the bulwark and seizes the Confederate colors, but for the instant, and is downed by a bullet from the young wife's musket. She waves the flag, but falls beneath the avenging bullets of the officer's men.

Her body is brought home and with a last look at the corpse of his courageous wife, Kosgrove undergoes a complete regeneration, and he reenters the service with a vow to never return without capturing a Union flag as a trophy. "Stonewall Jackson" was routing the Federals and advancing on Washington. With Jackson's permission the boy heads a body of brave Southerners, and retakes the position lost by the Grays and stoutly maintains it, replacing the Union Stars and Stripes with the Southern Bars that his martyred wife had saved, thereby being commended by Jackson.

Then they brought him home too, but the war was over. His foe, who was exiled, and with a smile of reverence he entwines the both colors in his stiffening fingers. With a last glimpse at his country's banners, he departs this world, and his soul flees to join that of his wife before the Bar of Righteousness and the Stars of Love.

A HALF BREED'S COURAGE.—A wild, haram scarum cowgirl is the "Rose" of the ranch. We see her first shooting the hats off the heads of the lined up boys, though widely sought, she refuses offers of marriage galore, but when handsome young Wilbur Newburg comes forward, she accepts him and from then on undergoes a complete change.

A few months later she develops into a meek, gentle and loving wife to a husband who adores her. Charitable to almost a fault, the entire neighborhood loves her, and when any of the boys get wounded by stray gun-shots, they come to Rose for medical aid. In this instance, Mose, the half-breed, is struck through the hand by a stray bullet, and he at once solicits the attendance of the Newburgs, who accept him in their household until the wound is healed.

Tearing off the bandage, the half-breed announces himself cured, and is going to return to his shack in the mountains. For the protection of his still weak hand, Newburg gives him his gauntlets, and Mose, putting one on, tenders promises of grateful service should they ever require it, and then departs. He stops on the way, however, to let Rancher Colgne's little girl play with his braids. They are interrupted by the irate father of the child who provokes a quarrel. A gun is drawn in the scuffle, which explodes and causes the death of Colgne and the disappearance of the half-breed.

The boys start in pursuit of the offender and in examining the dead body, espy a glove lying nearby. It is one of Newburgh's gauntlets. This renders damaging evidence. Despite the earnest protestations of Newburg and his wife, he is led away by the sheriff. Wild with grief, the little woman bethinks herself of the half-breed, who received the gauntlet, and concludes that he is the slayer.

Jumping upon her horse, she dashes to the scene of the crime, and then picking up the trail, rides madly off to seek the real murdered and thus save her husband. Mose strongly disdains against returning to justice, but later succumbs to her womanly and tearful appeal for his gratitude and for her husband and then consents to go back. Then commences a race against death—for Newburg has been sentenced by his captors to death by rope.

The wife and half-breed fairly fly over space and their efforts are not in vain to stop the execution of the innocent, as they arrive not a minute too soon. With the explanations exchanged, the men are satisfied to liberate the one for the other, and thereby preserve the law of justice.

passion, has all the resources of his mind and heart called into activity when his mother is brought face to face with death. There is a soul of a man in the little major, but it has only been shown when he puts an awkward squad composed of his two sisters through a military drill or devises an imitation of the Indian-Cowboy play. The moment, however, that real danger threatens, he meets it with greater skill and fortitude than any of the grown-ups.

Father, nurse and physicians form a small army of defense against the ruthless invader. Death, when he threatens to take the light of the home, but the mother sinks into the depths of despair, losing uttered his evening prayer, is put to bed, but while the other children sleep, he is restless. He wakes from a dream, a tiny tot in pajamas, and walks to the lattice window of the nursery where the moonlight streams in. He begs for aid from on high, first in childish invocation then in prayer. Light comes streaming on his face and into his mind. He steals softly through the house past the watching husband and physicians and makes a tender appeal to his unconscious mother. He calls and calls, never weary, never losing faith, until his loved voice reaches the fluttering soul and brings it back from its wandering. It is a triumph of pure love, but when he has triumphed, the little major takes all the credit and repels the watchers.

BILL AND THE GREASY POLE.—The Annual Fair at Slocumgosloe is about to take place and among the lamentable events of the old and exciting sport of climbing the greasy pole. Accordingly the Mayor orders a large pole well greased from Mr. Jones, in whose employ is the inimitable Bill. It falls to the lot of this humorous individual to deliver the pole and therefore, starts off with it balanced upon his shoulder. Meeting en route a carriage he promptly puts the pole through it with disastrous results, for a rather exciting time Bill enters a cafe, but this merely results in his leaving hurriedly and also in some of the customers present finding a seat upon the floor equally as hurriedly.

THEY DID NOT BUDGE.—Farmer Hayseed, his wife and child come to town, and here encounter a sandwich man. This sandwich man is really a photographer, who is obliged to disguise himself and carry his own advertisement in the streets as well as take photographs when customers do turn up. He is willing to take anybody who is willing to be taken and so he lures three innocents into his studio. He gets in before them and manages to whip off his disguise just in time to await their entry. Then, placing his patrons in the most uncomfortable positions favored by the camera fiend, he tells them to sit perfectly still. Barely has he issued this injunction when the janitor brings him a note announcing that his uncle has just died in Chicago and left him the sum of $6,000,000. With a whoop of joy the photographer picks up his bag without bestowing another thought upon his patrons. In due course he arrives in America and we are then given another glimpse of the studio where the family are still waiting. The eggs in the basket of Mrs. Hayseed have hatched and little chickens are scratching for their food. The child has grown into a strapping young fellow. Old Hayseed has grown a venerable beard, but still the family has not budged. One day the photographer, who has cast off wife and family, birthinks himself of his old studio. He returns and is surprised to find a regular farmyard in his studio and in place of the sun, with its rabbit in last left there, an old man and woman with a strapping son of six feet. He then quietly walks up to the camera and takes the whole family, whereupon Hayseed and his wife and six-foot son walk slowly out after heaving a heavy sigh of relief.

YANKEE.

THE MINISTER'S SON.—Madge Morton, who after losing her mother, is left alone in the world. She is cared for by a minister, who soon learns the girl's story and adopts her. The minister has a son by the name of Harry, who takes a large amount of money from his father's desk to spend on a girl he met while at college. Madge, who has witnessed the deed, is discovered in the room by the minister, who, believing she stole the money, orders her from the house. In the meantime, Harry is apprehended of the girl's character, and returns home with the money intact, only to be told by his father that he has ordered Madge from his home, believing that she stole his money. Harry immediately starts out to find the girl, which he does. She is reconciled with the family, and all ends happily.

A CLOSE CALL.—The sheriff and his posse, not on the heels of the horse thief, notice a stolen horse tied outside of the general store, but the horse thief elides capture, leaving the stolen horse behind him.

In his escape through the woods he comes upon John Rodgers, a young ranchman, who has dismounted to water his horse, and which the horse thief takes possession of and rides off. John fires after him but merely wounds the desperado.

John has been away from home for some time and has been hurriedly called back by a message from home and in his anxiety to lose no time he looks for another mount. He visits a nearby farmer for the purpose of borrowing a horse and finds no one home, so decides to temporarily take a horse so that he might proceed on his journey.

The sheriff, not in pursuit of the horse thief whom they know could not have gone far on foot, runs across John with a strange horse in his possession and naturally assume that John is the man who has been guilty of the previous thefts and make haste to mete out speedy Western justice. John tries to explain and pleads with his captors and it is only after John produces the letter from his wife to their effect that there has been a new arrival in the family, and that she wants him home at the earliest possible moment, that they credit John's story and allow him to depart.

John arrives home approaching the house he sees his own horse tied in front of the door, which he cautiously approaches and recognizes a strange voice. John enters the house quietly, and to his surprise finds the horse thief—whom he has wounded being made comfortable. John gets the drop on the horse thief and makes explanations to his wife and immediately departs with the culprit in tow to the sheriff and the posse that they have made no mistake in having his story. John delivers the horse thief over to the sheriff, who takes charge of him.

THE LITTLE FLOWER GIRL.—William Bentley becomes acquainted with a pretty little girl who delivers flowers to his sister from a neighboring florist. Inquiring of the whereabouts of the florist he finds a number of visits and finally finds the girl that he dearly loves her. After asking her to marry him he finds that his father will not consent to the match and after a scene with his father, he leaves home. The sister of William hears of his trouble and as she loves her brother dearly, she resolves to help him. She delivers to the father's consent will be procured.

She visits the little girl and after telling her of her plan, she directs her to pose as a college chum and to accept an invitation to visit William's sister. Knowing full well that her father would receive any of her old friends with open arms.

The invitation is accepted and during her short stay in the household the girl who by now has won the heart of the old gentleman. Her accomplishments as a vocalist and violinist and her winning manners make a favorable impression on the mind of the father.

Mr. Hartley writes to his son telling him what a lovable girl his sister's friend is and urging him to return and try to win her love. The son replies to the letter telling him that he will return at any other than the flower girl. The sister sees the letter and writes to her brother, telling him of the misdirected. The son returns at the next train. After he has told his father his intentions of marrying the little flower girl, they go to the store, return to the office to be known to the father as a treat he is very anxious but bashful he relents and the loving parents give their consent.

TRAMP STRATEGY.—Dan Wellington objects to his daughter's marriage with Richard Burlington. The father finds the letter in the arms of his daughter and puts them out of the house. The son is allowed never to followed out of the house by his sweetheart and would. The latter announces a brilliant idea whereby the lovers may be reunited. Remember That Awful Fire that destroyed the Lakeview school house at North Collinwood, Cleveland, O., back in 1908? One hundred and seventy-four lives were lost (nearly all little children) just for lack of proper fastenings on the fire-exit doors. That couldn't have happened with the Von Duprin Self-Releasing Fire Exit Latch in use, because in that case the first child who touched the door would have opened it, just by that touch, and those precious young lives would have been saved.

Won't you try the Von Duprin now, and learn for yourself that it cannot fail? Catalog on request.

PROGRESS IS NOT DUPLICATION

Duplication exists only where things are exactly alike. THE MOTIOGRAPH does not duplicate the obsolete projection machine, the heavy cumbersome "thrown together" kind you have been used to.

THE MOTIOGRAPH is distinctly different, and in its superior design, construction and workmanship, it does not "duplicate." It leads, others follow.

THE PATENTED DOUBLE CONE SHUTTER projects a 25 per cent. brighter picture. ALL GEARS ARE ENCLOSED, protecting them from dirt and grit. OIL BATH FOR STAR AND CAM. PATENTED QUICK REWIND from main crank with INSTANTANEOUS MAGAZINE SHIFT. No tool kit needed to handle the MOTIOGRAPH, as every gear and screw is accessible.

THE MOTIOGRAPH projects the PAINTED ON THE WALL SORT of pictures that every owner should have.

From the Patrons View Point

What Causes People

to continually patronize one Picture Theatre in preference to another? Of course, location, appearances, films, etc. have a great deal to do with it, but quality of the picture is what builds up a steady patronage that makes the business profitable.

This depends largely on your light and if you are using any other device than a to step down your current you are not getting best results.

With our machine you can produce a clear, white, steady light that won't worry your "house" by continuous flickering and will surprise you with the difference it makes with the films.

It is the only device that can be changed instantly to any of the three intensities without breaking the circuit between adjustments.

But this is not all. We will guarantee that our Compensarc

Will Cut 65% from Your Light Bill and we'll send you one on 30 days' free trial to prove it

We have a little 22 page booklet that explains all the reasons why. If you want a better light at your present cost, send for it today. It's free.

THE "The Poet of the People" Is Here!

THANHOUSER

WO-A-WEEK

RELEASED TUESDAY, APRIL 25

The Poet of the People

"The King Laughs while the People Starve"

is a grand presentation of life in the middle ages, when the upper classes were really up, and the common people had nothing in common except suffering, starvation and oppression. In the France of the early Louis the people became resigned to conditions to the extent that never a murmur was heard from them. But a poor poet and his poetry changed the complexion of things a bit, and the reel gives the why and the wherefore.

No. 205 Code Word, Poet.

RELEASED FRIDAY, APRIL 28

The Skyscraper Elevator as a Lifesaver!

An Elevator Romance

is a portrayal of the thrilling adventures, sharp trials and real perils encountered in an office building aflame. How, in the excitement attending the discovery of the blaze, the workers rushed forth and left behind them the pretty switchboard operator—how this slip of a girl stuck to her board in an effort to notify the fire department of the blaze—how a cowardly elevator man refused to go to her rescue and how a boy who loved her did make the trip—is all shown in a masterpiece of realism that will cause comment anywhere.

An "Imp" De Luxe!

"The Scarlet Letter"

Released Thursday, April 27th

At last we are able to fix a definite release date on this the first of a series of Imp Films de Luxe, which we believe will give Imp Films a stronger grip on your affection and a firmer hold on supremacy than ever before. "The Scarlet Letter" is an ultra fine dramatization of Nathaniel Hawthorne's world-known novel. The treatment of the plot is delicate—in fact this feature has caused us to take, re-take and re-take many of the more powerful scenes. We have avoided improper suggestion. We have staged each scene more elaborately than anything we have produced before. The acting will delight you. The photography will astonish you. And it will all come to you on Eastman stock, insuring the highest degree of moving picture perfection in every detail. Now that we have brought out such an Imp de Luxe as this, the point is—

Will You See That You Get It?

Will you ask your exchange for the earliest possible booking? Will you demand, insist, fight if necessary till you get it? Will you keep hammering at your exchange with letter after letter till you get what you are paying for? We've done our part. Will you do yours—beginning this instant?

Here's Another You Must Get

Our release of Monday, April 24th, is peculiar in plot, so much so that it will create no end of comment on the part of your audiences. It is entitled "While There's Life There's Hope" and deals with two men and their interrupted attempts at suicide. If your exchange can't give it to you, there are other exchanges that can and will. Public Opinion Controls.

FIRST ARTICLE.

"One can show the public no greater respect than in forbearing to treat it as a mob. The mob hurry unprepared to the theatre, demand that which may be immediately enjoyed, desire to stare, be amazed, laugh, weep, and therefore compel the managers, who are dependent on them, to descend more or less to their level."—GOETHE.

These words were written more than one hundred years ago by the immortal author of "Faust," himself a theatre director of no mean abilities. What the poet Goethe described as the characteristics of the "mob," applies, it must be admitted, to a very considerable percentage of the moving picture theatre audience of today. Our people "hurry unprepared to the theatre," and "demand that which may be immediately enjoyed, desire to stare, be amazed, laugh and weep." Have the public in these days of hurry and bustle not the right to demand these things? How can we expect them to come to the theatre "prepared"? Of what is the preparation to consist, and why should they not get "what they want when they want it"? The form of speedy entertainment demanded is well supplied by the motion picture, and this without any injury whatever to the proper "level" of the entertainment.

It is a fact, of which every film and machine manufacturer and exhibitor may be reasonably proud, that, with all the speed of the entertainment, its quick succession of scene and sentiment, the picture has steadily improved, in projection, in technical quality and in subject. Glancing back through the stories of the films in the pages of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, we find less and less of the Indian chasing the wicked half-breed or depraved Mexican through 1,000 feet of variegated scenery, and we find more of the drama of life as it really is, less and less of the china-smashing "comedy" and the chase around street corners and through alleys and more of the lesson-bearing play—the picture that pleases for the time being, but also contains a thought, maybe a precept, which the mind will retain.

It has been asked why so many films are so soon utterly forgotten. Is it not because the forgotten ones are mainly composed of a series of incidents, sometimes disconnected, generally a whirligig of rapidly changing scenes, which keeps the brain busy trying to solve the puzzle while it is on the screen? Is it not "out of sight out of mind" because it fails to show the work, the thought, of a master mind. A good story may be spoiled in the telling. The producer who is a deep student of human nature, who is a thinker as well as a producer, can take the most simple story and so garnish it with his own metaphysical ideas that it sinks deep into the mind of the spectator and will live in his memory.

While the quotation from Goethe has been applied to the motion picture, we must admit that it (the picture) has shown as much tendency to elevate as to "descend" to the level of the mob. If the manufacturers find that the demand for the classics is not encouraging, can they be blamed for catering to popular, if trivial, tastes? Does the theatre manager have recalls for "Rigoletto," "Launcelot and Elaine," "Les Miserables," "Francesca da Rimini," the Shakespearean dramas or visualized prose and poetry such as "Tale of Two Cities," or "Maud Muller?" Not so that you would notice it. Around the beginning of this year we printed a request to exhibitors to inform us as to what pictures of the year 1910 had been specially recalled by request of the spectators. The exhibitors responded generously, but we hesitated to make copy of the replies. Frankly speaking, it was because the evidence showed that the "mob" demanded a kind of picture that it has not been the policy of this paper to encourage.

We argued to ourselves that the most demonstrative element of an audience is generally the least intellectual, and noted with satisfaction the heavy vote for certain poetical stories and especially the historical drama, and, of the latter, "Custer's Last Stand" was credited as being the greatest drawing attraction. It is but fair to a certain company to say that the Ali trademark stood highest in the count of films that created the most impression on the audience. It is also apropos to remark that the Ali trademark takes frequent and daring leaps from the sublime to the ridiculous. Is this done for effect? If so, it may tend to affect, in time, the Ali popularity. Among the films mentioned for recalls were "Ramona," "Pippa Passes," and "The Mended Lute," all of the poetic order. It is no small praise to say that the highest encomium of "The Mended Lute" came from the Dakotas. When people who live among the Indians and understand their customs and mannerisms wax enthusiastic over an Indian photoplay it speaks highly for the genius of the producer. Genius in this case is the capacity for doing big things by making the most of the little things, and in knowing what is the right thing to do. Innumerable are the anachronisms and absurdities of the dilettante producer who essays to depict races of people and periods of time with which he is unfamiliar. To cite an example: While "The White Squaw" was being shown in Proctor's Theatre one day this week we overheard a lady and gentleman making very severe criticism on the antics of the supposed "Indians" and pronouncing some of the actions as impossible and absurd. A polite inquiry revealed the fact that the couple were from Nevada and that the lady had been born and raised among the real Indians and naturally could not stand to see them so caricatured. Expert and severe criticism, 'tis true, and pity 'tis 'tis true, because this self-same film contained some of the most beautiful photography of real Western scenery and some of the most artistic settings ever seen upon the screen. When pictures that are produced in the real West can fall down on characteristic details, it causes us to wonder what criticism is heard in Western theatres on the Bowery cowboy chasing the Mills Hotel "Indian" amidst the Jersey or Long Island scenery.

But this is digressing.

We have shown that the film manufacturer, by depicting the poetic, the classic, and the historical, discloses a latent desire on his part to uplift rather than "descend to the level" of the mob. We have also gathered evidence to show that the mob can show equal appreciation of a dish of husks, which proves that the mob is an omnivorous animal. As a mixed diet is accepted as being the most conducive to the long life of an omnivorous animal, we may not be wrong in deducing that a mixture of the trashy with the classy is most conducive to the long life of the picture business.

But to one who spends much time among the theatre audiences and studies their silent or expressed demonstrations of appreciation or otherwise, there can be no doubt whatever that the ambitious attempts to portray the deeper and finer emotions of the heart, the laudable efforts to teach, to appeal to the best impulses of humanity, are always welcome in the theatre and win substantial applause. If a noble act is portrayed it is sure to please, for it is a weakness of us humans to imagine that we would have acted the noble part in a similar case. Therefore, to close this first article on public opinion control of the destinies of the motion picture, we will say that our observations and deductions point to the photoplay presenting a noble charater as the one most calculated to win the subutantial applause of the mixed audience.

The advent of moving pictures was regarded with scorn by the theatrical profession. An actor who valued his reputation would not appear in the despised picture, and if by chance one of their kind chose to escape starvation by posing for the camera, he at once lost caste and was considered a renegade from his noble profession. We know the rest; it is fresh in every one's mind how the moving picture went its way in humility and worked its way up to the high position which it now holds in the dramatic art. The theatrical journals that once affected to despise the picture we have seen come to their knees and grovel for the advertising of the celluloid play. The Billboard, the Dramatic Mirror, The New York Telegraph, The New York Clipper and other such theatrical papers emphasize more clearly than any other agency how great has become the prestige of the photo-drama. Where once they pretended to ignore the film play, one by one we have observed them humbly knocking at the film-makers' doors in search of patronage. Their advertising circulars today vary in inverse ratio to their former assurances to the profession that the motion picture was going back and would never become a menace to the play-house proper.

It has long been predicted by ourselves and others that it is only a matter of time when the photo-play will draw to its support the cream of the theatrical profession. Perhaps it is a little too soon to say that the time is already at hand, because actors who have made a name upon the stage are still looked upon, in a measure, by their professional brethren, as renegades when they cast their lot to act before the camera instead of before the public. But the movement is on. In Europe it has been the vogue for a few years past for the top-notch players to appear in motion pictures. But in America actors who appear in celluloid reproduction are still looked upon as renegades of greater or less degree. The greater the actor the greater renegade he becomes in deserting the footlights for the arc-light.

Nat Wills in the "King of Kazam."

Of late this feeling is mitigated, for many of our prominent actors and actresses are beginning to feel the call of the camera, and we have a slight suspicion that there are a few of them who would welcome an offer to pose in moving pictures for more reasons than one. The moving picture is a fulfillment of the invocation of Robert Burns: "Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us, to see oursels as ithers see us!" The opportunity to study one's self as others see us is in itself one strong reason why actors should pose for moving pictures. But there are other reasons. An actor may act and not act at the same time, or, by twisting it a little, an actor may act in a dozen cities at once. It places him in the same position as the magazine writer who is read from the printed page without having to go personally and repeat his words before an audience. And last but not least, there is big money in it for recognized stars.

The MOVING PICTURE WORLD has the pleasure this week of welcoming to the field of moving pictures that well-known comedian, Nat M. Wills. Perhaps he will be considered a renegade by his associates, but that term has now lost its sting, and the imprecation lacks force or point. If the vaudeville profession regards Mr. Wills as a renegade on the one hand, we welcome him on the other as one of the pioneers of American actors in the realm of the photo-drama, or photo-comedy to be more correct, for Mr. Wills will appear as the principal comedian in a series of tramp comedies in the Power's Photo-Plays. And while welcoming Mr. Wills into his new field of endeavor we take this opportunity also to congratulate the Powers Company in securing the services of that well-known comedian, the result of which will give added prestige to their output, and without doubt will mark an improvement. The moving picture is no longer a nine-day wonder; the big results are yet to come, and we shall not be surprised at any time to hear of more well-known performers and actors turning renegades, if you please, and casting their fortunes with the little strip of celluloid.

Mr. Wills will appear in a series of films of a comic-opera nature entitled "The King of Kazam." These pictures will be produced under the direction of Mr. Francis A. Powers and Mr. Wm. Raynous, both of whom have trod the boards in the days gone by, and were well known as actors of ability before the moving pictures appeared.

A Photoplay that Went Over.

We have lately pointed out that the attitude of audiences differs remarkably. Yet, under anything like fair conditions, a good play will hardly fail to be accepted with pleasure.

There are elements in any good scene that the larger part of the audience never notices. A good scene exists solely for the action that it shows. This action may take place in far-distant times or in the present; but, if it is not in a time with which the audience is thoroughly familiar, the dresses, uniforms, furniture and surroundings will seem peculiar and interesting in themselves, and therefore will take part of the audience's attention from the action, somewhat weakening the scene. These things are necessary to any picture of the action, though, for while the mind doesn't consciously notice them when they are natural, it does unconsciously, and will consciously notice their incorrectness or their absence. If, at the exciting moment of any scene, one also notices that the acting is either good or bad, or that the music is playing, one can be sure that something is wrong. In the perfect picture, all those things are kept in the background of consciousness, they are seen but not noticed, while the action is going on. But when the spectator has breathlessly watched the action carried past the climax, if something laughable happens to take all his attention for a moment, the relief is a very pleasant experience. When we've seen a tragic picture or one that was saved by a hair from becoming tragic, it is a comfort for us to be shown again that there is humor in the world. It puts us in a good frame of mind to enjoy the happy ending.

All of these points were illustrated in a recent release of the Essanay Co., "Across the Plains." Its faults are plain enough; but we saw it get hold of an audience and keep its grip to the end. We were in a critical mood and we concluded that this photoplay, good as it is, would have had much less power without the music that backed it in this case. One of this play's good points is that music has an excellent chance to bolster it up. The play was shown at Keith & Proctor's Union Square Theatre, and the man at the piano intelligently took advantage of his chance.

In this play a girl in a prairie-schooner runs from a band of Indians. Two cowboys see her. One goes for help, the other rides alongside and fires back at the Indians. Later he and she hold an empty cabin till the help comes. It is an exciting moment; their ammunition is spent; the Indians have closed in and are hammering the door (very carefully, by the way). When the rescuers come and open fire on the Indians, the tense moment has passed. An Indian who is shot takes a ridiculous fall, and it is a good anticlimax, for it very effectively takes the audience's attention. At the same time the musician, who through the play had been giving exciting music, obtruded a queer little run on his piano-keys. The combination made the audience ripple with amusement.

At the same theatre, at another time, when a photoplay, "The Letter with the Red Seal" (Gaumont), was being projected, and in the scene where the ship's company are expecting a pirate to attack and are getting ready to repel him, we noticed that the music grew very exciting. Two spectators, in full view of the picture, got up and craned their necks.

The Comic Film.

By Mrs. F. George Eggleston.

What is a laugh? It's something like a kiss: the feeling is hard to define, but it's very pleasant. Some men are witty, and when they make comments on things as they pass, they show things up in a funny light. They don't make fuss; they merely draw attention to it. Funny situations bob up; they're unexpected. The comic is Nature's little joke, human nature's if you like; but at its best it is a situation that was not intended. The pleasure is largely in our unexpected discovery of it. In truth, to expect a joke is to lose it.

Now, the very things that hamper the photoplay in showing complex tragic situations make it one of the best possible means of showing to the spectators gem after gem in a chapter of these funny situations, each unexpected as to the smiling face that pops up from behind the wall when the "kids" think they are planting a nettle for Foxy Granpa. Two people might tell of it later, and might use the same words, but while what one said would be as funny as the smile of the Cheshire cat, what the other said would be stupid; he'd need a diagram. The photoplay is both joke and diagram.

The world, as many people find it, is monotonous; monotonous oftentimes as a never-ending misty day. Yes, many, many people find in life a gray sameness that is almost tragic. If it only would become tragic that would be a relief; but it doesn't. Anything that breaks into this is a boon, a precious, golden gift. Other people—they are not so many—long for a little monotony. To them, life is one unpleasant thing after another. Still other people, and to tell the truth they are very numerous, find life a pleasant mixture of hearty excitement and healthy rest. The contrast that they find, though, is not in their lot so much as in their character; they have the saving sense of humor.

You can't cultivate humor in some people. Heaven sends such to make the rest of us laugh. But in most people you don't need to cultivate humor. They have plenty of capacity; all they need is to have that capacity utilized; they need to be shown something funny. That's what the photoplay can do, and do it in its own way better than the funny monologue-man, better than the drama, better even than life itself, the life that the rest of us who are not Mark Twains see.

The truly funny photoplay, then, is the precious, golden boon we spoke of. It makes the sunlight of laughter break through the gray sameness of our lives. It is a panacea for ills that flesh is heir to. Taken in time, it will cure dyspepsia, melancholia, domestic troubles, wind-colic. Taken before we go to bed, it will make us want to work hard next day, and it is cheap—that is, when it is once produced; for, to see it costs only ten cents or perhaps half that. But good comedy itself isn't cheap; comedies are as scarce as diamonds.

Comedies are naturally harmless; they can be shown to children with perfect safety. They are often welcomed, as at church and Sunday-school entertainment, where tragedies are barred. Comedies are sure of a general popularity, while even the best tragedies may enjoy only a special popularity—some may like them very much, but there are always likely to be some who dislike them. Comedy is the backbone of the photoplay business. In a recent interview, an exhibitor said:

"We must have humorous pictures to draw the crowds. The tragic pictures are well enough as fillers, but if there is not at least one good comic feature the bill is a failure. Our patrons come not to see the emotional side of life, which to them may be too common. They want to be amused and forget their cares. The comic film fills the house, but they are getting less humorous every week."

A first-class comedy is a small fortune to the lucky firm who owns it. It brings in gold and it ought to be paid for with gold. As it is, film-makers have got what comedies they are now using cheaply. Also they have rung the variations on certain comic situations till there's no more humor in them. I mean such themes as the theft of a bicycle or motor-car by a man who can't ride it, and who therefore endures a hundred mishaps, mishaps that once upon a time seemed funny to us. Good comedy isn't inexhaustible in the sense that it will come on demand. Molières, Goldsmiths andSheridans are not so numerous as the soberer dramatists; yet there seems always to be a certain amount of good comedy available. Some wide-awake firm might profit highly right now by making an offer of a large prize for the best comedy submitted within a certain time. If the prize were advertised widely, and was big enough, it would bring in many good manuscripts. The best one would cost "real money," but the rest could be had for a more reasonable figure, but for more than the ridiculous price now paid for comedy or tragedy alike, and the result would net a handsome profit. A man or woman who can write one good new comedy can often write others, and he is sure to take his wares where he can get the most for them. It will pay to be liberal with good comedy writers.

Violence and Bloodshed.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

There is nothing new about public hostility to the introduction of scenes of violence in plays. For a long time the French theatre—when it laid down the law for Continental Europe—permitted no killing in the sight of the audience, one peculiar exception being suicide. A character could kill himself in a tragedy, by poison or steel, but was not allowed to kill any other character in the play—not so you could see it.

The English were more bloodthirsty.

Voltaire rejoiced in an English theatre when he saw Brutus harangue the mob with a bloody knife in his hand over the body of the murdered dictator. Early tragedy in England was given to shedding blood on a grand scale. The rude audiences especially enjoyed the feast, the more there was of it, the stronger they thought the play, while no such representation was tolerated in France. The audience learned of what had happened from an eye-witness.

Just how far art should follow nature is a delicate question. To my way of thinking the struggle is an essential part of the play; there are pathetic and telling situations tamed, if not lost, where tragedy is implied instead of actually seen. On the other hand, I am disgusted with any deliberate attempt to awaken bestial desire, or feed blood to the coarser element of an audience by working up to a brutal scene for the mere sake of its brutality. Accounts of suicides, hangings and stabbings which are given a prominence in the daily press are often of no advantage to the community, and it is just as well to eliminate them from moving pictures altogether, unless intelligent censorship can be exercised. The accumulation of abhorrent incidents given in Indian and cowboy plays under the pretense of picturing actual life is so repulsive in its low savagery, so beastly and unsavory, that it might be just as well to cut out such plays indiscriminately. When these plays are filled with murder, rapine, torture and false sentiment, they are not only inartistic, but are ineffective save with the few low-brows who like them, and, besides, are turning millions away from the little theatres. They are repellant to the cultivated, and even cease in the course of time to stimulate the jaded appetites of the unwashed. No necessity exists for any such representations; they are not pictures of life; rarely have they the faintest pretense to historical accuracy; supposed thrillers they are, but they excite more derision and disgust. I have seen decent people before a theatre entrance turn away at the sight of a poster announcing one of these dramas of blood and nastiness, and many refuse to go inside of a picture show because of them.

It is quite another thing if tragedy comes in the natural course of a story as a matter of poetic justice when it tends to elevate the struggle or the characters presented, where the effect is ennobling instead of degrading, or where there is a profound lesson involved.

Why should not art be natural?

It is true that all things in nature may not be fit for representation on the stage, but no reason exists why art should directly oppose nature. Where there is a valuable idea to be conveyed the audience is unwilling to accept mere resemblances. If there is suffering involved, such as we all feel in the eternal struggle, the suffering must be shown; it excites our compassion and may lead to greater tenderness in our views. In our secret hearts we all like to see life depicted on the stage as it really is, and rebel against conventions and traditions as we do against a picture given purely for the sake of its sickening horrors. Let us have what is true, what is going on; existence of today as we all recognize it; hold up the shame to ridicule; lay bare the grafting of politicians and other unclean birds of prey; extol the nobility and the value of splendid efforts, and tell again the same old, sweet story of love as often as possible. We all enjoy a play taken from any old era, when it's good, but we enjoy it most when it reflects our own times; we like it best when its scenes, and manners, and characters, and morals are of today. If, in the natural course of things, the story involves a death struggle, that is all right if the tragic feature is an incident in a design, not a designed incident.

It is all right for the dramatist to see the immoral as well as the moral side of life; he can be fully aware of the worst characteristics and basest motives of those around him, and it may be to the advantage of what he writes; he can even be influenced by the same forces as those operating against human betterment, but he must have a strain of lofty aspiration if he would appeal to the highest as well as the lowest elements in the average audience. Let his purpose be high, the incident is excused.

Let no playwright be worried about the "happy ending." Such a termination is an anomaly, if not an impropriety, if the trend of human weakness and the impelling forces of nature point straight to a tragic finale. We know where neglected disease leads, and bad habit is disease. The transforming power of evil habit not only furnishes an abundance of dramatic material, but gives the audience a theme to study and can be made to point a lesson with a tragic ending. The drama has often found its finest expression in tragedy, consistent and true to nature, yet moral. The moral nature of Macbeth had become a horrible wreck before his overthrow and death. The latter was expected and deserved. The tragedy was the natural sequence to his crimes, and poetic justice was exemplified.

The man, whether he be playwright or producer, who says that our people want to see in picture plays certain things that are vitiating such plays, is in ignorance of what is going on around him. The whole country is aroused on the question of race betterment, and is deeply and unselfishly interested in making the lives of those who are to follow us finer and more beautiful than our own. We do not desire to stimulate what is low in our children, but to train them to exercise self-control, to let their minds dominate their animal natures. We hope to make them better than we are; millions of parents are giving the best part of their lives to that noble end. Moving pictures are now a factor in this evolution, and the best we can do—we who are interested in the business—is to treat the public with the same sort of decency and respect that we hope to receive.

A Progressive Theatre Will Prosper.

Results of Honest Competition.

By Robert Grau.

A conservative estimate made recently during a discussion as to the progress of cinematography resulted in a general admission that at least ten million new theatregoers have been created in this country through the remarkable vogue of the picture theatre. It was also conceded that in the last five years no less than ten thousand theatres, varying in seating capacity from 200 to 5,000, have come into activity, and for every one of these since discarded at least two regular theatres have reverted to the use of the camera-man.

Can any one be surprised that ten million persons who had never seen the inside of a playhouse were attracted to the spectacle of a pretty theatre giving varied and often educational entertainment at prices within the reach of all?

Of this ten million new entertainment-seekers probably one-half are tempted occasionally to witness plays and operas in the regular theatres, and this is a revelation which alone explains why the theatres of the United States have been able to withstand the tremendous competition with which they have had to contend.

A manager of twenty-five years' experience in Streator, Illinois, Mr. J. E. Williams, in an address to the Drama League at Evanston, Ill., gave expression to conditions which must exist in every "one night stand" in the country, and this is what he said:

"Today there is scarcely a one night stand theatre in America that is paying a profit, and the majority of them are threatened with bankruptcy and extinction unless reinforcement comes from some quarter. Many of our local theatres will have to be turned into garages, warehouses and department stores, and the drama will have to return to primitive conditions of production in town halls or similar places of assembly." That this is not the expression of a pessimist is best illustrated by a reference to another part of his address: "And paramount, the advent of the moving picture into the amusement field, which has emptied the galleries and balconies, has driven the medium priced companies off the road, has established vaudeville houses in towns that could not otherwise support them, and has so cut into the amusement fund of the one night stand that there is not enough left to support the dramatic theatre of the town."

The writer, however, has endeavored to delve deeper in a desire to discover just what is the basic condition and to what causes the upheaval may be attributed. To begin with, the moving picture theatre has brought into the amusement calling an entirely new crop of showmen, and these are not of the calibre which stands still and waits for the public to enter its theatres. The new generation of public caterers brought into the amusement field though the potency of cinematography have shown a great discernment, in making their theatres inviting, in changing the program frequently. And some of these gentlemen are prospering so amazingly that they provide an incentive (something heretofore lacking in the amusement calling) to outside investors, with a result that capital to almost any amount is for the first time available in a line of endeavor which not so very long ago was regarded with contempt and extreme pessimism. Moreover it is to this class of showmen that the tremendous increase in theatregoers is due, and that they have not conspired to wholly obliterate the regular threatres (as they seem to have done with the popular priced ones) is unquestionably due to the patronage which now comes to the latter class of playhouses from a public that formed "the theatre habit" for the first time. This has greatly offset the loss of patronage which Mr. Williams refers to in his address.

We must not forget, too, that the film companies have been quick to realize the great advantages to be had from availing themselves of the very actors who were wont to entertain in the popular priced theatres, and these ladies and gentlemen are now comfortably and profitably employed in posing for the many photoplays which now form so important a part of the offerings in the picture theatres. This has resulted in an utter end to the "Rialto" congregating for which upper Broadway has been famous.

One has but to make a tour of the picture theatres at this time in order to learn how the better class of actors have adapted themselves to the new conditions which now confront them. And it is to the credit of these fine companies that in making up their rosters they have shown much intelligence. While the gentlemen are men who have commanded the best positions and the highest salaries in the regular theatres.

graph Company, is one of the best actors in this country. His salary has been as high as $250 a week, and that a film company can afford such an eminent and capable artist in a position where reputation counts for nothing, is the best evidence in the world as to why the regular theatres have been sorely tried in an effort to stave off the unavoidable results of such competition.

I asked David Belasco if he had ever found it worth his while to make a tour of some of these picture theatres, particularly those in which photoplays are a feature. He had not yet done so, but was much impressed by my recital of observations in them, and I would like to hear his opinion after a visit to some of these little theatres.

Recently I undertook to visit a half-dozen of the smaller houses in a single day and evening, and the experience was not one to be regretted. The cluster of players engaged by the "Imp" Company impressed me greatly. They are all young and bright-looking, and although I have been an active figure in theatredom almost up to this day, not a face was familiar, and yet these young people are splendid actors whose portrayals are sincere, and what is more important, they are excellent pantomimists. While they all seem very enthusiastic, which to me seemed strange in view of the fact that the picture player is not advertised, but I believe the day is not far off when such efforts as these will command serious attention from the press, and then will come the reward to such deserving artists, for they will then achieve fame, and this will lead to the stars of cinematography, just as we have the stars of the stage. It has got to come!

A film evolved by the Nestor Company, entitled, "In the Commissioned Ranks," was impressive because of the intensity of the delineations of two or three of the players, but this merely disclosed the presence of a master, for whoever "staged" this film surely needs no instructions in his profession. The audience in the picture theatre, despite that the operator was wholly incompetent and the musical accompaniment "fierce," was held spellbound.

I had with me as my guest on this trip to the smaller theatres, a stage director whose name is known all over the world, and he too was deeply impressed. We both decided that the reason for the great vogue of these places of amusement is a wholly constructive one—that of giving a public a great deal of entertainment, with attractive environment, and at prices of admission distinctly inviting.

Darkened Theatres

The zealots who have been advocating the better lighting of the moving picture theatres, claiming that the darkness is a breeder of crime, should turn their attention to some of the vaudeville acts now working on circuit. In one act which has been heavily billed all over the Keith & Proctor circuit, every light is turned out; in fact, it is a provision of the act that the house be in absolute darkness. A young lady with a bargain-counter voice sings some mushy song about a flying machine. She does this seated on a toy aeroplane which is suspended at the end of a long crane working on the lazy tongs principle and controlled from the back of the stage. The crane is painted black, and in the darkness is not visible. Small electric lights on the aeroplane show its outline and that of the singer, who dangles her legs among the heads of the audience and apparently floats up and down and around. Of course she screams if some rude spectator reaches up and grasps her tootsie-wootsies or steals a garter as a souvenir. It seems to be the kind of thing that is popular with the "mob," but we compliment one manager who refused to take the act on the return circuit, just because of the darkness and the carryings on.

ED. (REX) PORTER.

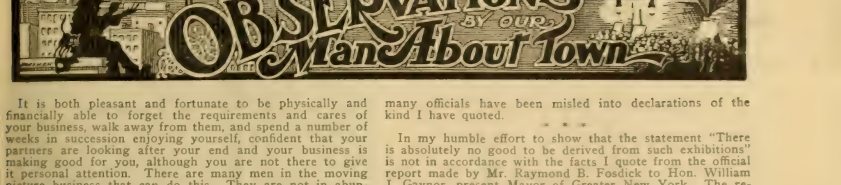
We present herewith a lifeograph of Mr. Ed Porter, General Art and Technical Director of the Rex Company, in which capacity he was formerly connected with the Edison Company. Mr. Porter is one of the old-timers in moving picture production work, and is a master at this craft, as his work testifies. He first showed signs of talent at the early age of six. After having heard the story, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," he essayed the role of Simon Legree, inducing his little country cousin to play the part of Uncle Tom. He made such a success of Simon Legree, according to the country cousin, that his dramatic career can be said to date from that time, and ever since he has been mixed up in some branch of the show business.

Mr. Porter is very modest, and we found it difficult to draw from him any great amount of information, except the following which is tabulated herewith.

Type of beauty, cute; favorite recreation, Pittsburg stogies; favorite author, himself; favorite color, moonlight blue; pet flower, lily (last name not given); attitude towards the ladies, coy; suffragette views, same as his wife's; size of biceps, normal; 16; inflated, 23; size of hat, normal; 6¾; inflated, 6⅞; principal weakness, cats.

REISINGER CELEBRATES 25TH ANNIVERSARY.

Hugo Reisinger celebrated on April 1st the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of his business as importer of carbons and other electrical supplies. The employees of the firm presented Mr. Reisinger with an artistic address bound in leather and silver with the signatures of the entire staff attached. Mr. Reisinger was the pioneer in the importation of lighting carbons to this country, and was the first to cause to be manufactured at the works of C. Conradty, Nuernberg, enclosed arc and flaming arc carbons. He is probably more thoroughly identified with the carbon and lamp business than any other dealer in America, and the trade-mark "ELECTRA" of his carbons is known to everyone in the electrical field. Mr. Reisinger took a prominent part two years ago in the fight for a lower tariff on lighting carbons, and it was largely through his personal effort that the rate of $1 per hundred feet, at first proposed in the new tariff bill, was reduced to 65 cents. Mr. Reisinger suggested that 20 cents per hundred feet would be about fair, but it was impossible to push this reduction through. Outside of business Mr. Reisinger has devoted a great deal of time to art matters, and has promoted the exchange of works of art between America and Germany. He was Honorary Commissioner General for Europe to the World's Fair at St. Louis in 1904, has twice been decorated by the German Emperor and once by the Prince Regent of Bavaria. He is an active member of the New York Chamber of Commerce, and a director in many important companies.



It is both pleasant and fortunate to be physically and financially able to forget the requirements and cares of your business, walk away from them, and spend a number of weeks in succession enjoying yourself, confident that your partners are looking after your end and your business is making good for you, although you are not there to give it personal attention. There are many men in the moving picture business that can do this. They are not in abundance, nor do they number among the exhibitors or the film exchange men. There are Marcus Loew and William Fox, for instance. They are among the most wealthy and prominent of the exhibitors, but they are always on the job. If they have clipped off any easy stages in life during the past few years in which they have made their fame and money as moving picture exhibitors I have not heard of it. Their extensive interests are of such a peculiarly personal character, notwithstanding they have very able and competent lieutenants, that they seem unable to take their attention from them even for a brief week-end at one of the seaside resorts. A trip to Europe, to Florida, Maine, the Pacific Coast, or even a mission of health to Hot Springs seems to them to be a most unreasonable suggestion. It is said of Mr. Fox that he remarked to a friend who suggested a brief recuperation at Hot Springs that the only springs he had been able to connect with for several years were the bed springs, and that his visits there were of short duration. I believe it. He is an incessantly hard worker, but none the more than Mr. Loew. I think these two men would make the hardest working team that ever entered the theatrical, not excepting the Shuberts, Lieblers and many other reputed never-let-ups. But so much for the exhibitors, who among the film exchange men throw the harness and take a spin at pleasure. Let me think. No, I cannot recall one. There used to be a crackerjack at it—Frank Howard, of Boston, Mass. He would work like a beaver for months and then slide off with his devoted and amiable wife to some realm of recreation for two or three weeks; but he is not an exchange man now. Despite his pleasure trips, he made good to such an extent in Boston that he was one of the first to attract the attention of the General Film Company—that limb of the Motion Picture Patents Company, and he is now spending all his time in pleasure trips. I was just trying to think of his present whereabouts, but my thoughts fail. One thing is certain—he is having a good time and is making a host of friends, wherever he is. But the man connected with the moving picture business who is at present plucking pleasure from the tree of life by the bushels is Mr. J. Stuart Blackton, of the Vitagraph Company of America. He and his beautiful wife and their most interesting child are certainly having one big time in the South. Most of their time during the past several weeks has been spent in Florida and Mr. Blackton has been performing great stunts with his racing motor boat, Vita. This is a condensation of the name Vitagraph. Last week the boat walked away with five elaborate silver trophies representing as many races, the contestants representing all parts of the country. The fifth trophy won was emblematical of the South. Oh, Jim, how I envy you! Fortune, reaction, fame, silver cups, banquets! It strikes me that moving pictures are pushing Standard Oil for first place as a source of revenue.

In commenting on a case before him a few days ago a police court justice in Brooklyn said: "Many little girls brought to this court trace their troubles to moving picture shows. There is absolutely no good to be derived from such exhibitions." It seems rather severe to so sweepingly condemn such shows; in fact it does not seem fair to do so in view of the official report recently made by the municipal committee appointed to investigate them.

* * *

Many young girls have laid their troubles at the door of such shows, but in many cases they have done so to keep from the knowledge of their relatives and the courts the true origin of the evil brought upon them, and the newspapers, at least a majority of them, have only been too eager to help nail the odium upon the picture shows. So sweeping have been the reports and criticisms that many officials have been misled into declarations of the kind I have quoted.

* * *

In my humble effort to show that the statement "There is absolutely no good to be derived from such exhibitions" is not in accordance with the facts I quote from the official report made by Mr. Raymond B. Fosdick to Hon. William J. Gaynor, present Mayor of Greater New York. The report is dated March 22, 1911. It has been freely referred to by the newspapers, trade papers and other publications, but repetition of extracts may serve a good purpose here. Mr. Fosdick says there are approximately 450 motion picture shows in Greater New York under a common show license and 550 under a concert or theatrical license. Of the total number, approximately 600 are constructed with a seating capacity of under three hundred. Whenever charges have been made that girls or boys have been harmed or misled by picture shows the places upon which the odium has been cast rank in the list of houses of the smaller capacity—the houses numbering approximately 450, in operation every afternoon and evening 365 days in the year. Combine all the complaints of the nature referred to for the past year and see how small they are in percentage when compared with the number of picture houses in operation and the number of shows given during the same period, even granting that a large percentage of the cases charged to the picture houses cloaked other sources of responsibility.

But the quotation on which I base my main point is this: "As a result of this censorship the character of moving pictures has greatly improved in the last two years. It can now safely be said that there are no obscene pictures publicly exhibited in New York. Occasionally an indecent film, unauthorized by the Board of Censorship, is surreptitiously introduced by a manufacturer. Such a film is, however, immediately run down and eliminated. * * * The frequent allegations of vice and immorality made possible by the absolute darkness in which the films were formerly presented, would today, be largely unfounded. In this and other respects the intelligent efforts of the chief of the Bureau of Licenses has secured a steady improvement in moving picture show management."

And in addition to this let me refer to the Board of Censorship, the organization of which was co-operated in by the People's Institute. The board is a voluntary organization, composed of representatives of a large number of civic bodies, and has assumed a national character. Contrast the statement of the Brooklyn official that absolutely no good to be derived from moving picture exhibitions with the statement made by the Board of Censorship, which is as follows: "In struggling with the moving picture problem the censorship is dealing with nine-tenths of the total theater problem. Moving pictures are now the most important form of cheap amusement in the country. They reach the young, immigrants, family groups, the formative and impressionable section of our cities, as no other form of amusement, and cannot but be vital influences for ill or good. They are the only theaters which it is possible for the entire family of the wageworker to attend. In their social and educational possibilities they provide the basis for a neighborhood theater of the people." Therefore, I take the liberty of adding, there is good to be derived from them.

It is a pity that the motion pictures have not been more frequently favored with honest and disinterested expressions of opinion from such broad-minded men as Justice Greenbaum, of the New York Supreme Court. A case against a motion picture manufacturing company was recently tried before him and the jury awarded the plaintiff a verdict of $12,500. The justice subsequently cut the verdict down to $2,500. He clipped off $10,000 because he thought the jury had been influenced by undue sentimentality or by prejudice. After the jury's verdict was rendered many newspapers with them usual eagerness to get a slap at anything pertaining to moving pictures glowingly approved the plaintiff's victory. When argument was made to have the ver-duct set aside the counsel for the plaintiff used some of these newspaper articles to help bolster his argument in opposition. Justice Greenbaum reproved the counsel for doing this and stated that it would be unfortunate indeed to allow newspaper reports and criticisms to influence the acts of courts of justice.

The treasurer of a moving picture theater in Brooklyn was arrested the other day for stealing $1,177.48 from the safe of the house. Ah, ha! Murder will out. I stated in one of my recent letters that I could not find an owner of a moving picture place who would confess to making any money, and now the treasurer has come to my rescue. I cannot reward him for having done so, but I will accord him a distinction, even if it is a doubtful one. I will accord a dollar to a doughnut that no other treasurer of a moving picture theater ever made a more dazzling flight through the yellow lights of Fourteenth Street, New York, than he did. He confessed to spending $553.65 in that thoroughfare with a couple of girls the night before he was arrested. There is a spectacular picture for you.

MANY NEW INSTALLATIONS.

Through the Motion Photo-Plane Company, two more of the Keith & Proctor theaters have installed motiographs during the past week, viz.: Majestic Theater, Indianapolis, Ind., and Keith's Mary Anderson Theater, Louisville, Ky. Mr. J. H. Hallberg, the economizer man, also reports the sales of spot lights to Wm. Hayes & Son, Henderson, Ky., and A. E. Charron, Ottawa, Canada. To the latter he also shipped a double dissolving stereopticon and Standard economizer. Also a 550-volt D. C. economizer for the New Empress Theater, Victoria, B. C.

Hyman Theater, Los Angeles.

Written for the Moving Picture World by Richard V. Spencer.

Los Angeles' newest and most elaborate picture palace is named after Mr. Arthur S. Hyman, president and general manager of the Hyman Circuit of Vaudeville and Moving Picture Theaters, the Western Amusement Company, Western Film Exchange and other theatrical and amusement enterprises. The theaters comprising the Hyman circuit at the present time are: the Hyman, the College, the Walker, the Rounder, the Royal, the Luna Park, and the Hyman Venice Theater, now in process of construction, which will be opened by the time this article appears in print.

Mr. Hyman has the unique distinction of being the only man to ever open two pretentious theaters in the same city within a period of only seven days between opening dates. This occurred when the College, costing $35,000, and the Hyman, costing in excess of $45,000, were completed. These two theaters are conceded to be, among those who are in a position to know the facts, among the finest moving picture theaters in the world. Either of them would be a valued ornament to any city, and here in Los Angeles, a city famous for its beautiful theaters, their construction aroused much favorable comment in real estate and theatrical circles.

The Hyman, seating a thousand, is the largest, as well as the most sumptuously equipped and luxurious of the city's moving picture theaters. The theater is located on the corner of Eighth and Broadway, opposite the largest department store in the West. It covers a ground space of 50x175. The exterior of the building is decorated with pure white plaster. The foyer has the usual tile floor and is wainscoted in select white Italian marble to a height of eight feet. The ceiling of the foyer is in plaster decorated with plaster brackets between which are gold-leafed "H T" monograms of pleasing design. The box office, also in marble, is more commodious than the usual box office. The foyer doors leading into the lobby are of mahogany, with brass wearing plates.

The lobby of the Hyman is a symphony of luxury. The wainscot paneling and other woodwork is constructed of Juana Costa mahogany of selected grain, which has been given the dull finish. The well-padded lobby carpet is of green velvet brussels. The lobby is well equipped with mirrors, a feature that the women patrons appreciate. Opening off the lobby are retiring rooms for both men and women, and a stairway leading to the operating room and to Mr. Hyman's luxurious private office in the front of the building. The draperies leading into the foyer and into the auditorium are of silk velour, the inner facing green, and the outer facing wine colored, with "H T" monograms in white leather.

Exterior Hyman Theater, Los Angeles, Cal.

The auditorium has a seating capacity of 1,000. The mahogany opera chairs are roomy and are upholstered in red leather. Two six-foot aisles permit the handling of capacity audiences without unnecessary crowding. The aisles are carpeted in green velvet brussels, matching the lobby carpet. The ceiling and side wall decorations in the popular Art Noveau effect, are very pleasing. Two large leaded art glass skylights adorn the ceiling, which is beamed, and from it are hung leaded art glass lanterns. The side lights of the auditorium are also lanterns, but of smaller size.

The stage is 24 x 30, and is well equipped with scenery painted by the Ernest Flagg Scenic Company, and contains comfortable dressing rooms for the actors and actresses employed in the vaudeville turn.

The operating room is large, finely equipped, well ventilated and thoroughly fireproofed. Two Model B Edison Projectoscopes are used, together with a dissolver and a spot light. Two competent operators, under the direction and supervision of L. M. Nelson, chief electrician and chief operator of the circuit, are always on duty. Projection is faultless.

The policy of the theater is to run high class vaudeville specialties interspersed with first-run Licensed pictures.

The seven-piece orchestra is under the direction of Miss Bessie B. Hardy. The orchestra play the specialties in a way that leaves little to be desired. Miss Hardy also shows careful discrimination in her choice of incidental music to accompany the pictures.

The house management for Mr. Hyman is under the competent direction of Mr. Stanley Warde Hart, who has handled vaudeville attractions for many years.

The architects for the building were Train & Williams, who were aided by Mr. Hyman's suggestions.

The theater opened during the December holidays and has played to excellent business ever since. For the first month or so Independent pictures were run, then Mr. Hyman decided to run both vaudeville and pictures. On March 1st the house changed their service to Licensed.

"The Scarlet Letter" (Imp.)

We had the pleasure of visiting recently a private exhibition of one of the latest Imp Productions, which is the well known story of "The Scarlet Letter," by Nathaniel Hawthorne. To put "The Scarlet Letter" over in proper fashion is a matter that calls for classy acting under any circumstances. Without that it is nothing, but with the splendid company of actors which the Imp concern is known to have, the undertaking of "The Scarlet Letter" could not be considered as a risk. With the three principal characters of Hester Prynne, Rev. Dimmesdale and Roger in the hands of such competent actors as Miss Lucille Young, King Baggot and William Dailey, there is no criticism to be made on the way these parts are handled.

"The Scarlet Letter" is a play that draws as much upon facial expression and emotional work as it does upon action, which makes it a difficult piece to "put over." This play has been produced in motion pictures before, but in no way do the previous productions surpass the new version by the Imp Company. The work of Mr. Baggot as the Rev. Dimmesdale is superb and leaves nothing at all to be desired. It is even and consistent throughout the action and carried with it the strongest connection all of the time. We were especially impressed in the last scene with his portrayal of the death of the erring preacher and his death fall from the platform of the public stocks to the stage was a perilous feat, wonderfully accomplished. Mr. Baggot is to be commended upon his final success in performing this hazardous piece of business.

Miss Young as Hester is found to win sympathy from audiences by her beautiful rendition of this part. Her consciousness of sinfulness, love, humility, repentance and sorrow is only further evidence that she is a shining star of the Imp firmament.

In the character of Roger, we perceived unquestionable work on the screen. Mr. William Dailey whose excellent portrayals of old men parts has attracted our attention from his first appearance. His handling of this character is in all respects the equal of some of his past unexcelled performances in that line. Mr. Dailey is a real actor, one of the best we have ever seen in moving pictures, and we hope to see him many times again.

There is little to be said in criticism of the acting itself, which is all that could be wished for. It is not possible for us to gauge accurately just how this version of "The Scarlet Letter" will take with the public, for, as usual, there were no sub-titles in the reel, which we saw. Granting that these sub-titles will be distributed judiciously and lucidly throughout the scenes, it will in all probability come through with flying colors. The scene of the public street showing the stocks seemed rather flat and shallow. A street scene, above all others, should convey the idea of depth or distance, which this scene did not. It is very obviously a painted drop upon which shadows fall, and it was also very easy to see the line of connection it made with the stage. It would have been better if it had been set back further, thereby relieving the scene of the sense of being crowded when all the characters appear in the ensemble. Aside from this point the picture is well up to the Imp standard.

J. F. BROCKLISS.

A welcome caller at the office of the Moving Picture World this week was Mr. J. F. Brockliss, of London, England. Mr. Brockliss is the proprietor of an establishment in London, where the exhibitor can equip his theater from floor to ceiling, every necessary requisite being kept in stock. He is also European agent for the Motiograph and the record of sales he has made for this in competition with other high class machines is marvelous. Mr. Brockliss is a type of the clean-cut Britisher,, brusque and always on the go. That keen judgment guides his ventures is shown by the remarkable growth of his business in the last two years. Brockliss is a man of his word, a man of action, and with a high financial rating. He is a safe man to do business with, as is shown by the fact that the shrewd Carl Laemmle, while in Europe, selected him to represent the Imp films. That he has done so and done it well is a matter of record. He has also made a name in Europe for the Powers Picture Plays and he hopes to add other American made films to his account. He explained that the selling conditions are such in his territory that it is to the advantage of all if a certain number of films are represented by one house instead of their being scattered in different offices. We cordially recommend Mr. Brockliss to any manufacturer desiring representation in Europe. During his brief stay in this country he may be addressed at the Hotel Cadillac, New York, or the New York or Chicago office of the Moving Picture World.

The Sansone Amusement Co. will open the "Elk" Theater of Taylorville, Ill., as a first-class moving picture house with the latest illustrated songs. Manager John Sansone is buying a new machine, new curtain, slides, etc., to make an up-to-date theater of his new place.

FOREIGN REPRESENTATIVE.

Mr. Karl Lohse, of Dusseldorf, is in this city for a short time looking over the American market and has a number of high class dramatic subjects of 2,000 feet and over with him, of which either negatives or positives will be disposed of. He is also looking for good American films which are not at present represented on the continent. Mr. Lohse may be addressed care Nelson Chesman & Co., 321 Brunswick Bldg., as per advertisement on another page, or at Room 457, Astor Hotel, N. Y. City.

OPERATOR WANTED.

A good operator in Maryland or that vicinity can learn of a position by applying to "M. P. H.," care Moving Picture World. Our correspondent writes that he is willing to pay the right wages to the man who can deliver the goods.

LECTURES AND SLIDES WANTED.

Anyone who can furnish illustrated lectures of a nature that would be suitable for a moving picture house, can do some business by addressing George E. Nixon, P. O. Box 552, Cincinnati, Ohio.

THE FLYING "A" CAUGHT IN A LARIAT.

Distinctively American, the American Film Mfg. Company have incorporated in their trade mark a mounted cowboy throwing a lariat. This would indicate that they intend to specialize on this kind of film, for which their ability has already been demonstrated in such releases as "The Squaw and the Man," "The Sheriff's Sweetheart," and "The Mission in the Desert." etc.

"CONFIDENTIAL."

Victor O. Woodward, Sandusky, Ohio, is the lucky one of the many applicants that replied to an advertisement in the World over the signature of "Confidential." He is now installed as general manager of a circuit of theaters in Cleveland and vicinity. The company already controls fourteen theaters and have seven in process of costruction. Some of the other applicants have been engaged as managers of individual theaters.

The condition of any business is usually gauged by the amount of business done. In this connection it may be noted that the Nicholas Power Company, manufacturers of Powers Moving Picture Machines and equipments, did the largest business during the month of March in the entire history of their activities. This is indeed an encouraging report, coming as it does in what is usually a slack time of the year in this business.

The Acme Film Company, of 12 East 15th Street, have purchased the Syracuse Film Exchange, formerly conducted by Mr. F. P. Davis. The Acme Film Company will carry a complete line of supplies and furnish the same grade of exclusive service that has made their New York office a success.

The Lake Shore Film Exchange Company of Cleveland, Ohio, E. Mandlebaum, president, seems to have taken on a new lease of life on its entrance into the independent field. A branch office has been established at Columbus, Ohio, under the management of Mr. W. B. Ward, and another at Cincinnati, Ohio, under the management of Mr. A. Dressner; both gentlemen well and favorably known in the film business. The Cleveland office, which recently moved into commodious premises on the ground floor, is still under the management of Mr. W. Mang.

As a Licensed exchange, the Lake Shore did a very large business up until a few weeks ago, and no doubt Mr. Mandlebaum will soon be one of the heaviest buyers of the Independent product. He is a jobber for the Edison and Powers machines in his territory, and has a special machine department carrying a complete outfit of parts.

There being another active Licensed exchange in Cleveland, the General Film Company did not see the necessity for two aggressive exchanges in that territory. Mr. Mandlebaum could have sold out to the General Film Company, but he is still a young man and active and desires to remain in the business, and there being no other alternative, he applied for Independent service through the Sales Company, into whose ranks he was eagerly welcomed. A man of Mr. Mandlebaum's stamp is a credit to the business, and his many friends in Cleveland and vicinity will no doubt continue to give him a large share of their patronage.

This week the Great Northern Film Company will release a moving picture taken from Shakespeare's Hamlet. Artistically, as a picture of much beauty, but especially as a picture of very excellent acting, one feels on seeing a private view of it that it is indeed a notable success. The mechanical work of the Great Northern Film Company deserves high praise and this picture seems very well done.

The film impresses one most as a picture of the histrionic art of Herr Neuss. It would be delightful if one could come pare its excellencies with films showing the Hamlet of Booth, of the elder Sothern, of Kean, of Irving. The pleasure of comparing many great Hamlets will belong to the critics of the following generations. But the Great Northern Film Company is to be congratulated on having the photograph of so interesting a Hamlet as Herr Neuss', and he is to be congratulated on having so clear a picture of his representation of this strange but very human prince.

Perhaps in all dramatic literature there is no character that gives to the competent actor a surer road to the hearts of men than this. Hamlet's mystery, his humanity, but above all his warm heart, endear him to every generation. Like poor, lovable Don Quixote, his sympathetic tenderness is one of the keys to his mystery. Hamlet had a marvelous insight into human characters and his mind worked so quickly that often the situation seemed pictured to him as by a lightning's flash. He was a royal prince and if he sought revenge it was always as a ruler and a just ruler.

In watching this film, I was anxious to discover how much of Hamlet'es character could be revealed apart from the words that bear witness to his thoughts. Of course, I was hindered by this that I remembered many of his words and, so, was likely to see qualities in the picture that otherwise would not have been so plain. As I watched the scenes unrolled, the pictures gave me thoughts that did "often lie to deep for tears."

Herr Neuss' Hamlet of the film vividly accents the heart qualities of the character, when he first comes out on the castle's platform—it is the actual Castle Cronsberg (Elsinore)—he places his hands on the shoulders of Horatio and Marcellus in a way that suggests how much his affection leaned upon their friendship, yet it was the gesture of a prince, too, of one who in the supreme moment will not be ruled but be the ruler. Again, when he advises Ophelia (Fraulein Sannom) to enter a nunnery, his gestures convey so deep a tenderness that the scene is poignantly affecting.

In this Hamlet nothing could be plainer than the quickness of his perceptions. In the scene where King Claudius (Herr. Aagel Hertel) is overcome with remorse and Hamlet comes upon him as he prays on the steps of his throne, the prince, now sure of his guilt, is about to stab him. The dagger is raised. As he bends over to strike, he sees the king's face. The dagger is caught half-way in its descent and Hamlet tip-toes away.

Fraulien Sannom makes a very beautiful Northland Ophelia; she seems a true princess; but on the screen she is perhaps more poetic than mad. In other words, she wasn't as pathetic as she might have been. The acting of all the characters is very intelligent and dramatic.

OPERATORS BALL!—LAST CALL.

Only a week remains before the grand Entertainment and Ball of the Moving Picture Operators' Benevolent Association, at Arlington Hall, 19-23 St. Mark's Place, New York City, on Friday evening, April 21, 1911. Judging from the great number of tickets already sold, there will be many more operators on hand ready to trip the light fantastic than the hall will accommodate. The object of this dance and entertainment is a very worthy one, as it aims to establish a sick benefit fund for operators who are members of the Association. All of the proceeds go to this worthy charity. Many of the film manufacturering companies and other well known concerns in the trade have lent their support by taking large advertising space in the handsome souvenir journal or programme. Other firms that have not done so are hereby reminded that there is still some space left in the book. Call or write Robert Goldblatt, care B. W. Borkowitz, 210 East 14th St., New York City.

Death of Polonius—Scene from Hamlet, The Great Northern Film.

AN APPEAL.

In the last issue of this paper there appeared several letters addressed to the editor commendatory of the educational page and its objects.

The oft-repeated desire for an advance in educational cinematography is being echoed in all parts of the country; that an echo should come from exhibitors is not only to their credit but is also an evidence of the distinct and progressive nature of the present application of moving pictures.

It is extremely interesting to watch the growth of public opinion in every phase of applied cinematography; when we say "public opinion" we do not mean only the general public who attend the theaters, but the universal public, including all authorities, as also those actively interested in moving picture work.

This growth of public opinion has been along lines long ago laid down in these pages; those directly interested in moving pictures have caught the higher desires of wise advisers on one side; and a discriminating public mind on the other. The outcome of this rapid and commendable advance is the appeal for more films upon educational subjects; also that more education shall be shown in subjects that in themselves are not intended to be educational.

A strong lesson to be learned by manufacturers from these published appeals is the increasingly greater need for more evidences of education, in the usual class of subjects which seems to be the particular brand of every maker.

Too much attention may be given to good photography, or to good acting; while too little attention may be given to good thought.

It is not enough only to raise the technical and moral nature of the play, to suit the artist and the censor; it must be remembered that people have minds, and that the mind needs a food of satisfaction of greater value than that which appeals to the eye or the ear.

Feed the mind! The wise man feeds his body with suitable and profitable food.

The glutton feeds his appetite regardless of help or injury, often needing the doctor. The sensualist uses his eyes and ears to feed his baser self, and he needs the censor. The intelligent man uses all his senses and faculties to feed his mind and is benefited thereby. A banquet is a very enjoyable affair, courses, changes, varieties, well prepared and well served. A moving picture entertainment should also be an enjoyable affair; it is the coming universal entertainer of all classes, therefore it must be full of changes, varieties, the serious, emotional, humorous; successful and satisfactory because well prepared and well served. The appeal will not be in vain, responsive chords are sounding in every direction, the harmony of pleasure with intelligence is blending in happy accord.

A WONDERFUL INVENTION—COMING?

Times out of mind the voice with the picture has been an accomplished fact, only to become an accomplished failure. The difficulties of synchronization have been only too manifest, and, despite the fact that many and varied scientific names have blended in the naming of a mechanism that combined sight and speech; we are today without the voice with the picture. Other shortcomings would also appear in the monotone of a single phonographic voice, which would not only become tiresome, but would also be little more than of an explanatory nature, in that it could not follow the many voices and parts of a theatrical representative. That which is really needed is the talking picture, not a picture and a phonograph in separate parts, with a two-machine difficulty, but a veritable picture film that shows pictures and talks at the same time. A combined film and record, one that takes pictures and records sounds at the the same time; a mechanical eye and ear. The representative of a leading French film maker told the writer recently that such a wonderful invention was occupying the attention of some eminent French cinematographists at the present time. It is certainly a laudable ambition which, if successful, will again revolutionize the moving picture world in all its agencies of usefulness. Think of a real theatrical representative being caught in both sound and sight, and reproduced upon one machine with one record—film, thus giving figures and voices identically as in life; the effect is almost too startling to contemplate.

Nevertheless who shall dare to declare it impossible? to the writer's mind it seems but a natural outcome of the circumstances as they confront us today. The cinematograph is a wonder, but it is here; the phonograph is a wonder, so it, too, is here; a combined cine-phono-graph is a wonder; it is not here, but it is coming.

Some Things for Which the Moving Picture is to be Blamed —or Praised.

It is an old story that the moving pictures have killed the cheap theaters, and seriously injured the cheap vaudeville; but this is not all by any means. Certain places, usually found on the corners of streets, in which the corner loungers frequently stray, are complaining of diminished trade. In suburban towns, especially, the authorities declare that corner meetings which often resulted in mischief are no longer common.

The streets, too, are not the resorts of young people as much as formerly, the moving picture has provided a place to go, something to see and to do. A further benefit is arising from the fact that the constantly bettering of the pictures and theaters is proving beneficial to the moral tone of their patrons. Social conditions generally are on the upward grade, making it possible to assume that if the future is to be a larger growth of the present, the time is not far distant when the moving picture places will become a distinct aid to the social and moral well-wishers of every community. In this transitory state it will be wise for all in authority to lend their aid in using the agency of the cinematograph to combat many of the current evils. It is pleasant to record the growth of the powers of the moving pictures in supplanting many present evils, besides offering a positive attraction for good.

A UNIQUE POSITION.

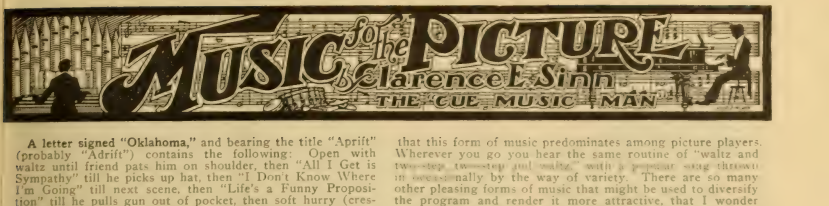
Is it worth while calling attention to the fact that this paper is perhaps the only publication devoted entirely to the educational principles of cinematography? That this is so, is, we believe, an actual fact. The English "Bioscope" has published a series of articles pertinent to these subjects, not venturing to maintain a continued interest in that which we believe must form a permanent feature of moving picture development. In this unique position past experiences have proved the wisdom of this effort, making clear the actual necessity of its purpose in the future. We trust it is clearly understood by our army of readers that the applied uses of cinematography to education is not the only object we have in view; the uses of education in all branches of moving picture work is also another division of this important topic which we trust will be equally profitable.

TEACHING THROUGH THE EYE.
The Prediction of an Authority.

The President of the Brooklyn Institute of Science and Art, which last week presented a certificate of Honorary Membership to Rear-Admiral Peary, remarked in a subsequent address, that he believed such progress was being made in cinematography, that within the space of five years "teaching through the eye" would be an accomplished fact and art.

The Brooklyn Institute is known the world over as one of the most powerful of its kind. It is not in the least surprising that this endorsement of and further testimony to the value of the moving picture, should come from such a source. The further value of this statement comes as an incentive to encourage those most vitally interested, whose attitude has hitherto been so lukewarm in this direction.

There can be no doubt that all endeavors and enterprises arising in the fulfilment of this prediction will meet with success.



A letter signed "Oklahoma," and bearing the title "Aprilt" (probably "Adrift") contains the following: Open with waltz until friend pats him on shoulder, then "All I Get is Sympathy" till he picks up hat, then "I Don't Know Where I'm Going" till next scene, then "Life's a Funny Proposition" till he pulls gun out of pocket, then soft hurry (crescendo for climax). When he picks up girl (?) go back to "Life's a Funny Proposition" till he is sitting down in house, then "What's the Use of Dreaming"; when friend comes in and shakes hand, "Gee, but it's Great to meet a Friend." Waltz for gallery scene till friend shows his picture, then "Some Day When Dreams Come True." When he is introduced to lady, "How do you do Miss Josephine." When she leaves, "So Long Mary." "No Place Like Home" for next scene. When wife sees he is getting cold toward her, "All that I ask is Love" Scene in studio, "I Love my Wife, but Oh you Kid," then 'Be Sweet to Me Kid," "Next to Your Mother," etc. For the girl crying scene I use "Nobody Little Girl." These are about all only waltzes that I use for this picture. If you think I am playing right and using good judgement, let me know. If not, tell me my weakness. I have studied hard to learn to play for pictures, and I never get to see them only at night at the show. I play them at sight.

I do not recall the picture and therefore cannot venture an opinion as to the appropriate music. The method you are pursuing has, I believe, the sanction of most picture players and I do not care to criticize it. From its musical synopsis, as given above, I should judge the story to be dramatic rather than comic, and, as a general rule, I favor the song title accompaniment for the latter rather than for the former. But I do not remember the picture and therefore can say nothing about this particular case. After all, as I have so frequently pointed out, the principal thing is to suggest to your audience musically the important parts of the story as told by the picture. Song titles will often provoke a smile by their very aptness to the situation (and they are useless if they are not apt), and it is for this reason that I feel cautious about using them in dramatic scenes. Both sentimental and comic scenes are well described by well known songs of that type, while for scenes of pathos it is hard to find anything better than plaintive songs whether known or not, as the tenor to these is always of a pathetic character. Every picture presents its own problems and I dare say you are solving yours satisfactorily. You seem to have a repertory equal to most occasions, aren't you the same "Oklahoma" who wrote about having all your music "in your noodle and at your finger tips?"

Buffalo asks for some good heavies such as could be used for storm pictures and battle scenes. Also says: "I mention the following numbers, which I have found very useful: 'Barra—a northern idyll,' 'Sicilienne,' 'A southern serenade,' 'Erinys—an eastern dance,' 'Zephyr—a western episode' (all from the suite of 'The Four Winds')."

Thanks for the titles. I also can recommend the numbers as being useful. Regarding the first question as to "heavies," etc., I may refer you to the publishers of melo-dramatic music. It is possible you may find what you want in their catalogues.

In a conversation with some friends the other day, one of them said to me in substance: "In one of your letters you object to waltzes in certain pictures as being suggestive of the ball-room. So far as my observation goes, the waltz on a concert programme is seldom or never played at a dancing tempo, and therefore has little to suggest dancing. It becomes simply a number in 3/4 time and as such its character should have no more weight than another number in 6/8 or any other tempo." I replied that the public is more familiar with waltzes and two-steps than with any other form of music, all the popular tunes are one or the other of not so in their original form, they are made so by the publishers in order to popularize them through the medium of the ball-room. The average person recognizes a waltz even when played at a bright tempo. Aside from that I know of no reason why they should be regarded with any particular disfavor for any purpose simply because they happen to be written in 3/4 time. It is because of this popularity probably, that this form of music predominates among picture players. Wherever you go you hear the same routine of "waltz and two-step, two-step and waltz," with a popular song thrown in occasionally by the way of variety. There are so many other pleasing forms of music that might be used to diversify the program and render it more attractive, that I wonder more do not take advantage of them. Reveries, Novelettes, Intermezzo's (other than "two-step's"), Gavottes, and any number of character pieces which would often be more acceptable than the dance music so generally used. And they are not difficult to find, either; I believe any publisher will send you a catalogue of his wares if you tell him who you are and what purpose you want it for. If those who are unthinkingly addicted to these two forms of dance music exclusively (and they are many) will follow this suggestion they will probably thank me for it some day—at least they ought to. Of course it goes without saying that melo-dramatic music is another essential which should be included on their list. There is plenty of that on the market, too

C. J. A., Chicago, Ill., writes: "Have not written the Moving Picture World for a long time, but nevertheless your page holds the same interest as ever. Since I last wrote I have secured the management of the Orpheum, first with a partner and at present by myself. You have my sincerest wishes in your endeavor to uplift the music end of the picture theater.

"In the April 1st edition of the World I read a long article by 'Connection' on your page. He seems to feel grieved because the pianist can, as I should judge from reading his letter, the leader) receives a greater salary than the drummer. I will try to enlighten 'Connection' on the subject if possible. In the first place 'Conn' (pardon the abbreviation) is evidently not a member of A. F. of M. and therefore would receive the same wages as the other side men, though not so much as the leader, which title alone should explain why the wage is not the same.

"There is an old joke among musicians to the effect that a certain house has so many musicians and a drummer in the orchestra. This joke is possibly a little overdrawn, but if 'Conn' would look into this from both sides of the question he would soon realize why he does not receive the same wage as the leader. To quote him: 'the piano is furnished by the theater and the piano player buys an occasional piece of music,' while a drummer must buy two or three hundred dollars' worth of goods and watch the picture from start to finish." Also in his article he says: 'I am playing one of the finest houses' etc. If this drummer is correct in this phrase, 'am playing in one of the finest houses,' I believe there is something wrong with the management or his next words are incorrect, viz: 'the player buys an occasional piece of music.'

"I wish to say that it would be impossible for a pianist to handle a four-piece orchestra (as he says the house uses), and especially a picture show orchestra by purchasing an occasional piece of music. The manager must be very easy going to let the orchestra rehash the same music night in and night out. I have about four hundred dollars' worth of orchestrations and I consider my music as but the smallest patch. Then laying aside the monetary expenditures, take up the time necessary to learn their respective instruments.

"I have a drummer working in my house at present who has been drumming nine months, plays double drums and bells in a very creditable manner. As to effects he is famous on the spot. A year ago the man had never had his hands on drumsticks. Can you imagine a pianist, violinist, cornetist or any other artiste any man being able to play a creditable job in nine months from the time he took up the instrument and not have previous musical training. I, with twelve years' experience in all parts of the United States in handling orchestras, I have never met a better drummer than a man who had been playing drums but about two and a half years, of course he was an exception.

"You will find fine musicians among the drummers, for instance, in the grand operas, especially in Wagnerian, a drummer must have a fine ear to keep his remarkable tuned [illegible] are not the other musicians higher advanced over the picture show brethren? Again, as to the effect making for pictures. Does not Conn. realize that the manager could hire a prop boy to make effects and pay him much less for doing so than he is paying the drummer? Also in a short time possibly do as well as the drummer? I have seen some fine effect men who did not know anything about drums.

"Let us take the last phrase of his remarks—must watch the picture from start to finish.' Does Conn. think that he must pay more attention to the picture for sound effects than the leader of the orchestra (whether he be pianist or violinist) for musical effects?

"Pardon me if I have taken up too much of your time, but could not let that communication go by without taking a fly at it. Am enclosing some of my programs and they will explain my position on the 'orchestra for picture' question. Seven pieces and am looking for more that are good. If the Exhibitors' Convention is held in Chicago this year, will make it a point to look you up."

"C. J. A." was formerly pianist in the house of which he now has the management. He encloses a number of programs, which indicates his enterprise as a manager. He is billing his shows like a dramatic production, with titles and synopsis of pictures, in some cases the cast of characters and the musical program.

The Edison Oxygen Generator.

A correspondent from Chillicothe, Ohio, who neglects to sign his name asks us to send him instructions for operating the Oxygen Generator, as he has mislaid those received with the apparatus. From the description we take it to be the Edison Oxygen Generator (Goodyear patent), which outfit we have used on several occasions with much satisfaction. Assuming that our correspondent knows nothing about the working of the oxy-hydrogen light, of which the Edison apparatus is a simplification, we will say that the oxygen is generated in the large tank (as shown in the accompanying cut) from which it passes through a series of controlling valves and a rubber tube connection to the small tank which is seen attached to the side of the larger one. In the small tank the oxygen mixes with an inflammable vapor such as produced by ether or gasoline, passing from there through another rubber tube to the jet. It will be seen that there are two tube connections to the jet. One conveys ether only, the other oxygen. By manipulating the valves to each tube so that the proper quantity of oxygen is mixed with the ether a brilliant and steady flame is obtained at the tip of the jet which heats the lime to the degree of incandescence required for projection.

The oxygen is obtained from cakes of a substance called oxone or oxylythe. This is injurious to the skin and must be handled carefully. First loosen the four thumbscrews around the top of the large tank and lift out the center piece. Inside this will be found a receptacle for the oxone. The outside tank is then filled with water up to a point about four inches from the top. The cover part, with the oxone receptacle attached, is then let down in the water and screwed down tightly. Oxygen gas immediately begins to generate, but automatically ceases under a certain pressure if the valves are closed.

Unscrewing the nut on the top of the small cylinder gives an opening through which commercial ether is poured until it begins to run out of a hole half way down the side which must be opened before the filling. This being done, the small cylinder is again hooked on to the side of the larger one, and all the valves closed, of course, until the proper connections are made to the jet. Now to get the light. The controlling valve on the top of the oxygen tank is slightly opened, this releases the oxygen which rushes into the small cylinder and gives pressure to the ether. Next open the valves at the top of the ether cylinder (stamped H to distinguish them from the oxygen), and apply a match to the tip of the jet when you will get a flame of yellow color like that of hydrogen gas. Regulate this to a height of about four inches and then gradually turn on the oxygen (O) valve regulating the two until you get the proper intensity of light.

Without the use of a diagram cut it is hardly possible to make the instructions clearer. We will obtain this and print full directions if enough of our readers are interested.

We take this opportunity to say that we have found the Edison oxy-ether generator to be absolutely safe even in the most inexperienced hands. It produces a steady and powerful light equal to oxy-hydrogen and sufficient to project a picture large enough for the ordinary hall. It is less difficult to handle and even less dangerous than electricity. For lantern slide projection it is preferable to the electric arc. For the church, the school, and even the traveling showman, we know of nothing better than the portable self-contained gas-making outfit known as the oxygen generator, of which there are several makes on the market.

Victoria Theater, Lawrence, Mass.

Built by Franz Carl Koenig, Philadelphia, Pa.

The cut herewith shows the facade of one of the most perfect small theaters in the United States. It is the Victoria Theater, at Lawrence, Mass. Though it has a seating capacity of 900, the space it occupies is only 34 feet by 99 feet long, and lobby space has been deducted from its length. The lay-out of the house is simple, and, as you see in the cut, it has a large open lobby. From this a five-foot stairway on each side leads to the mezzanine floor, and above that to a balcony. The windows on each side above the front sign, light and ventilate these stairways. The balcony is by no means a freak, although the house is small. On the contrary, the space is so well arranged that every seat in it, and the standing room also, affords a full view of the stage and the pictures. On the mezzanine floor below the balcony on each side are box seats with sixty chairs. The balcony being above, the boxes are more or less private, and this is a good arrangement for box parties. The operator's room is in the center of the mezzanine floor, and directly in center with the picture curtain. This arrangement will interest operators who know the difficulties of getting a perfect picture under other conditions. At the rear of the operating room is the manager's office, and on each side of that is a retiring room, one for gentlemen and one for ladies. These are in easy reach of all. The manager's office is lighted by the large windows shown in the cut above the entrance doors. From his desk the whole house may be readily controlled. The operator's room is directly under his eye. He overlooks the mezzanine floor and the auditorium. All stage orders are given by telephone to the stage manager and he can call attention to any defect in the performance at once. The operator's room is an iron frame, with asbestos boards. It is furnished with four machines, two picture machines, one stereopticon and one spot light. A special ventilating pipe runs from it to the roof.

There is no smell or foul air in the house at any time of the year, for a perfect ventilating system has been installed. By it, fresh air from the rear of the building is drawn through openings on each side of the proscenium arch. In winter this air is heated but it is always fresh. In the front are two large ventilating pipes, running from the auditorium floor to the roof. These are connected with horizontal ventilating fan which draws the foul air from the auditorium, the mezzanine floor and the balcony; all of which are connected with it.

The lighting of the whole house, except the lobby and front, is controlled by a panel board on the stage; the others being controlled by a panel board in the box office. The lighting effect is economical. There is no direct radiation on any floor, except at the side entrance to the balcony, the cash booth and the office.

The stage is as perfect as possible. The dressing rooms are under it. But they have plenty of ventilation, as each has a window looking out on the street at the back of the building. Hot and cold water closets are also provided for the stage. The stage door is large and is connected with a large stairway to the basement. The acoustic properties throughout the house are perfect in every respect. Every detail of sound can be heard in every corner of the house.

Great care has been taken in providing exits for the auditorium and the stage. There are two leading from the rear of the auditorium and two from the stage. The stage outfit has been carefully selected, not only as regards the scenery, but in every detail. The asbestos curtain is worked by an electrical device; the push-curtain by a special patented device for side pulling.

The front decorations are made of galvanized iron and staff. The cash booth is of wood and staff. A large window gives a rich stained glass effect. The wainscoting and steps are of Italian marble, and the floor of the lobby is mosaic. The side panels on each side of the piers are of galvanized iron with glass doors. Hidden electric lights in them show up photographs and posters. The color effect is as light as possible throughout the building, being buff, pink and ivory, with all woodwork in antique green with bronze finish. The chairs are finished in green and gold.

Mr. Franz Carl Koenig, 4012 Parkside Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa., is the architect, and Philadelphia contractors were given the execution of the whole building. It cost $25,000.

New England.

Since Mr Elmer Walters was placed in charge of the old Union Hill Theater, whose name has been changed to the Globe Theater, business has revived considerably, owing to the expert management of Mr. Walters, who is an old-timer in the show business, and one who knows the game thoroughly.

Messrs. Hennocksburg & Wesley are the proprietors of the Globe. This concern also operate a successful house in Gardner, Mass., and another in Syracuse, N. Y. All these houses are playing the policy of pictures and vaudeville.

The World's New England representative has been informed that the St. Mary's Catholic Church, Pawtucket, R. I., is to introduce motion pictures as a method of religious instruction. The pictures are to illustrate Bible history. The advent of the moving picture education will come soon after Easter, and, if the plan proves acceptable, will probably be adopted by other nearby churches, which are awaiting the result of the experiments with interest. Signs continue to multiply that the Church is beginning to see the immense religious and educational aspects of motography, and that they are falling into line slowly but surely. Let the good work come on apace!

Mr. John C. Bowker, a lecturer of Lawrence, Mass., has been sued by Thomas Cook & Sons, of Boston, managers of Cook's Tours, for $50,000 damages. The plaintiffs allege that in a recent lecture on the "Passion Play" Mr. Bowker referred to them in what they considered objectionable terms. The papers have been filed in the Boston Court House.

Manager Harry F. Campbell, of the Princess Theater, Marboro, Mass., decided to close the house on "Holy Week," and will open the Princess the following Monday. The Princess alternates between Independent pictures and vaudeville and road shows. The house is the best in Marboro, and is doing a very good business.

Messrs. Carlson & Mayer have completed plans for the erection of a large theater to be built in Haverhill, Mass. The house is expected to accommodate 1,600 people and will be the largest house in Haverhill. The auditorium will seat practically 1,000 people, and will be 85 feet deep by 80 feet wide. The house is expected to be open by September 15, and will be managed by Mr. L. B. Mayer, a brother of Mr. R. W. Mayer, one of its promoters. Mr. L. B. Mayer is at present directing two houses in Haverhill and is accounted an expert in the theatrical line. Haverhill can easily stand an expensive, high class moving picture and vaudeville theater, such as this one is intended to be; and the house should be a winner. Both Mr. Carlson and Mr. Mayer are well acquainted with conditions in that city, as the former hails from Lawrence, Mass., and the latter is often in Haverhill because of his brother's residence there. The house will be located on Merrimac Street, the best thoroughfare in the city for a large theater.

Mr. J. M.. Salamon. of Littleton, N. H., went before the selectmen of that town and requested that he be granted a license to operate a moving picture theater. The selectmen have held up the license until they shall have made an investigation, with a view to ascertaining whether Littleton needs another moving picture theater. The town already boasts of one small house.

Mr. John Keon, manager of the Comique Theater, Salem, Mass., is doing an excellent business using Licensed films, illustrated songs and no vaudeville. Mr. Keon personally picks out his picture program at the Boston office of the General Film Company, and states that a good class of well-selected pictures and illustrated songs are just about what is wanted in old Salem town.

Mr. Charles Hodgton, proprietor of the Princess Theater, Wakefield, Mass., prepared himself for "Holy Week." The Princess featured the "Life of Moses" reels to the limit, and cut out their usual vaudeville bill. The chances are that this program brought more people to the box office during the "Holy Week" than the usual bill would have done. Mr. Hodgdon reports his theater as doing a good business, and he has no complaints to offer.

Colonel John Dovey, who recently acquired the large Colonial Theater, of Lowell, Mass., is doing well with his new experiment. The Colonel knifed his vaudaville bill for "Holy Week," and played Licensed reels and songs only.

Mr. George Graham, manager of the Palace Theater, Fall River, Mass., is considering the advisability of playing a stock company in his theater over the summer months, instead of the regular attractions of pictures and vaudeville. At any rate, the "pop" vaudeville will return to the Palace in the early fall, should the stock company be tried as an experiment.

Boston.

The Apollo Theater.

Boston will soon possess one more high class theater, built for the express purpose of exploiting the motion picture. The Apollo Theater, on Washington Street, near Dover, is now in the process of construction, and will be ready for its opening this summer. The house will seat 800 people, the full limit allowed to all places of amusement in Boston, not conforming to the regulations required of the regular theaters. Messrs. Martin, Alexander, Simaelas and Hines are backing the enterprise, which will cost $35,000 before it is completed. The house has a good location, and, being brand-new from cellar to roof, should be successful with pictures and vaudeville.

The Moving Picture Endorsed.

In these columns of March 28, the World's New England representative made note of the fact that the moving pictures were to be excluded from exhibition in the schools of Boston, owing to the danger from fire which would arise from their use. This movement, as was then stated, was brought about by Mr. Charles E. Brock, of the Public School Committee, who found that the good results to be obtained from the use of the cinematograph in schools, was overbalanced by the evil effects, to-wit: their use would provide the first incentive for children to frequent the moving picture theaters, and the danger from fire. With such narrow ideas coming from the Hub, it is pleasing to note that Mr. Joseph Lee of the School Committee holds more liberal views regarding moving pictures. In a discussion of Sunday plays held in the vestry of the South Congregational Church, Mr. Lee stated he considered the moving picture to be a most commendable institution, and that he saw no wrong in having the man who labors throughout the week visit the photoplay theater on Sunday.

Dr. Edward Cummings was also present at the discussion, and was asked if he did not think the moving picture shows were bad things to be open Sundays. Thanks to the good common sense of Dr. Cummings! He replied that he was one of the few who had personally—mind you—personally investigated the Sunday moving picture shows. He found that some 20,000 people attended these shows on Sunday—fathers and mothers with their children. "As a rule," Dr. Cummings added, "the shows were very enjoyable, especially since the films had been censored." Dr. Cummings remarked that he should like to see a moving picture show in his church (South Congregational), and that it would be a good thing for other churches as these moving pictures are SPLENDIDLY EDUCATIONAL. Well, when people PERSONALLY look over the moving picture field, they usually feel called upon to utter similar recommendations. Dr. Cummings' and Mr. Lee's high position among Boston citizens, should make their views of great weight, and be of aid to motography.

Biograph Note.

Mr. George I. Appleby, manager of the Star Theater, Tremont Row, informs us that he "passed up" the Biograph reel, "Priscilla and the Umbrella," released April 3. The incident is worth mentioning since that reel was the only picture released by the Biograph Company since last June, not exhibited by Manager Appleby. "Not at all up to the standard of Biograph pictures," was Mr. Appleby's comment. This manager tells us that he has joined the Masons. This great order, together with the Elks and "White Rats," make Manager Appleby well known to many outside the trade.

The National Theater.

The National Theater, which has been ready for occupancy since October last, will not open until next fall, according to present reports. Seating nearly 4,000 and built entirely of stone, this house shows a big loss, due to being unable to open because of faulty construction in the rear wall. Mr. B. F. Keith is shouldering this load, having acquired the National from the Gordon Brothers Amusement Company, who originally promoted the house. The house was taken over by Mr. Keith while in the process of construction. These later developments which have kept the house "dark" since October make the National somewhat of a "white elephant" just now, but Mr. Keith will probably make a winner out of the house when it is once able to be open. Moving pictures and vaudeville will be the offerings.

HENRY.

In the Mississippi Valley.

That the use of moving pictures, rightly selected, is becoming more common in the various state charitable institutions is the announcement by Secretary A. L. Bowen, of Springfield, of the Illinois Charitable Commission. "The use of moving pictures for the entertainment of the insane is increasing rapidly," said Mr. Bowen.

Said Mr. Brown: "Moving pictures have been in use in the Illinois State institutions for some time." Also Supt. Hart at the Lincoln State School and Colony has used them for more than a year; and Dr. Carriel, superintendent of the Jacksonville Hospital for the Insane has also had great success with them for a considerable time. Dr. Sidney D. Wilgus, recently elected superintendent of the Elgin State Hospital for the Insane, has had them in operation for about five months. Other state hospitals are arranging to install machines.

"Difficulty is experienced in getting the right kind of films. The greatest possible care must be exercised by a superintendent in selecting pictures that will have the proper influence upon disordered minds. Moving pictures have been referred to, in loose writing, as methods of cure for the insane. Moving pictures do not and never will cure an insane man—that is, restore him to his right mind, but they afford him a pleasure and an amusement which ameliorate his condition."

The beauties of Chicago residences will be shown by moving pictures at the real estate show in Chicago April 28 to May 7.

Overtures have been made by three moving picture producers for the right to take pictures at the annual regatta of the Mississippi Valley Power Boat Association, which will be held the first week in July at Dubuque, Iowa.

Seventy-five members of the First Episcopal Church, of Seymour, Ind., are said to have signed a pledge that they will not attend any theater, including photoplay performances, for a year. Oh, very well.

Sunday moving picture shows were an issue of the village election at Webster Groves, Missouri. V. O. Sanders, of the Citizens' ticket which stopped the Sunday shows, was elected by vote of 744 against 673 for J. B. Wilson, candidate for the Independent party, which favored opening the shows on Sunday.

Milwaukee, Wis., showed motion pictures at a city ball. Two of five floors at the ball given for the benefit of the unemployed in Milwaukee, were devoted to moving pictures.

University of Wisconsin is to fight the house-fly pest with motion pictures. Sixty moving picture exhibitions, some of them out-of-doors, will be given in Milwaukee, Wis., in the campaign against the dangers of the house-fly and unsanitary dairy conditions. This work will be done under the direction of the extension department of the University of Wisconsin at Madison. The lectures by Harvey Dee Brown, of the university, will be in connection with the public school and social center work in Milwaukee. The Portmagbee Club at Monmouth, Ill., will undertake a similar movement to be worked in connection with the photoplay houses of that city.

The Mexicans, in celebrating the anniversary of their victory, the capture of Puebla by General Diaz, showed moving pictures on the Alameda Porfiro Diaz at Monterey, Mex.

Earl Hubbell, of Princeton, Ill., is now operator at the Star Theater, Henry, Ill.

F. G. McKeen has purchased from A. J. Frances a half interest in the Bijou moving picture theater, Alton, Ill., and re-opened the place.

T. A. Doolittle, of the Colonial and Colonnade theaters, photoplay houses, announces a two-reel program for five cents, an innovation in Galesburg, Ill.

W. L. Eck, of Jacksonville, Ill., has sold the Majestic Theater, in Jacksonville, to Lee M. Carroll, formerly of Beardstown, Ill. A new front is among the changes which will be made.

A new theater was opened on South Sixth Street, Charleston, Ill., by Archie Henderson and will be a strictly photoplay house.

Omer J. Jackson has purchased from R. A. Taylor a half interest in the Grand Theater, 425 East Main Street, Galesburg, Ill. The firm will be known as Taylor & Jackson.

Miss Emma Gannon, who has been soloist at the Princess Theater in Galva, Ill., has accepted a similar position at the Colonial, Galesburg, Ill.

The new Columbian Theater, Galva, Ill., will have its own power plant, the equipment consisting of a gasoline engine and dynamo. The building is being remodeled. Frank Spaulding is manager and Clyde Headley pianist. F. H. M.

Los Angeles Notes.

By Richard V. Spencer.

Bison Director Ill.—Mr. Montgomery, assistant manager and director of the Bison Company, was suddenly taken seriously ill with ptomaine poisoning Tuesday, April 3. He had just reported at the studio Tuesday morning when attacked. He was placed in a waiting automobile and hurried to his hotel, and a doctor summoned. As this is being written, Mr. Montgomery is reported better and is resting easy. Mr. Balshofer is now on his way East, and now with Mr. Montgomery ill, the Bison Company will enjoy a brief vacation pending his recovery.

Selig to Double Capacity of Edendale Studio.—Mr. William N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company; Mr. George Kleine, representative of the Gaumont and Eclipse companies, and Mr. Frank J. Howard, of Boston, were recently the guests of Mr. Francis Boggs, the Selig director, in a stage coach "joy ride." The ride took place in the recently acquired stage coach which was purchased from a Santa Ana company, and which had, in years gone by, played an important part in Southern California transportation. The party were driven to points of interest in the vicinity of the city, and upon their return said that they had enjoyed the trip very much. Mr. Selig has made arrangements to double the capacity of the present Edendale Studio, on which he has already spent a quarter of a million dollars, making it as it stands to-day the largest moving picture studio on the coast. The new studio when completed will have cost the Selig Company in the neighborhood of $350,000, and will be the largest and most sumptuously equipped studio in the United States. When the new Selig studio is completed, a new stock company will probably be organized, in which case the Selig Company will have two permanent stock companies at work in Edendale, which, with their Chicago company, will give them three producing companies capable of working at the same time without interfering with one another. The grounds of the present studio are being constantly looked after by a gardener. Grass, flowers and graceful ferns now adorn both the exterior and interior of the grounds.

Pathe.—Mr. James Young Deer, the Pathe director, was recently handed a big surprise package on the occasion of his recent, but not forgotten, birthday. The first surprise came in the presentation of a beautiful engraved gold watch presented by the members of the Pathe Stock Company. The inner case bears the inscription: "Presented to J. Young Deer by the Pathe Stock Company." The back of the case is also engraved with a handsome three initial monogram. Among the other gifts received by Mr. Young Deer were a handsome gold watch fob with an engraved charm, and a new summer suit of the latest approved weave of light colored cloth. That night the members of the company were the guests of the director in a box party at the Olympic, a musical comedy theater. After the show the members of the Olympe Stock Company, together with the chorus, repaired to the Bristol Cafe as the guests of Young Deer. There followed an enjoyable supper in which the members of both stock companies participated. Following the cafe supper Young Deer rounded up a bunch of automobiles and the whole party were soon en route for the Log Cabin, a resort in the Santa Monica Canyon. It was in the "wee" hours when the party finally returned to Los Angeles just what hour the Pathe director declined to state.

Pathe.—The Pathe Company recently took a series of downtown views. The pictures were taken in the heart of the retail shopping district, an obliging policeman holding street traffic and curious spectators to prevent their interfering with the picture.

Film Bonfire.—Suits pending in the local United States Circuit Courts have at last come to a head in the prosecution of Sears & Roebuck on charges of unfair competition manufactured by F. H. Berg and Fred Stopel, under the trade name of the California Motion Picture Company. The seizure was made by Deputy United States Marshal Franklin, following the court order upholding the validity of the patents controlled by the Motion Picture Patents Company, the plaintiffs in the action. Patent infringement allegations were the basis of the suit and the court decided that the defendants had used an infringing camera (said to be an old model Pathe camera) to produce the films. Stopel is said to have concealed his camera and to have put it beyond reach of the marshal. The films seized will be destroyed by United States Marshal Youngworth in the presence of the attorneys of the Motion Picture Patents Company. The name of the California Motion Picture Company should not be confused with the California Motion Picture Manufacturing Company, of Long Beach, which is a different company, said to be using a non-infringing camera.

Los Angeles Exhibitors.

Church Competition.—Prominent Los Angeles exhibitors are up in arms against the Salems Congregational Church, at Twenty-eighth and Hoover Streets. The pastor of the church, Rev. B. H. Reutepohler, has installed a projection machine and has been showing religious films and others at Thursday and Monday church meetings in order to add to his small congregation.

The pastor alleges that the purpose of this move is to aid in the elimination of indecent (?) pictures from public theaters, and to give the people a place where they may find good, clean amusement. All pictures showing any vice to theft, robbery, murder, etc., will not be tolerated, as he believes that such pictures exercise an abnormal influence upon young minds.

The pastor when interviewed by a Los Angeles "Express" reported said: "In the past we have sent out our people to be amused by the devil. The direct cause for such a large percentage of the people seeking amusement in places of illrepute, is that a large portion of them have at least eight hours each day in which to be amused. As nearly all amusements have been commercialized, the keen minds at the heads of them have resorted to the practice of giving the public shows of a sensational and suggestive nature, instead of furnishing them with places where good, uplifting pleasure can be had. I do not think that anything that will amuse and interest the people is necessarily bad; therefore, I believe that the installation of moving pictures in the church will eventually tend to elevate the moral character of the entire community."

Commenting editorially upon the subject, the Los Angeles "Examiner," a Hearst paper, said: "Realizing that the young people insist upon amusements and that if they cannot find them within the church they will seek outside, the Rev. B. H. Reutopohler, of the Salems Congregational Church, has decided to use motion pictures and illustrated songs to attract and hold the attention of both young and old. This is distinctly a step in the right lirection. Clean moving pictures are indeed a good moral force. Hymns illustrated by pictures make them more attractive. This move surely will do much to increase the attendance at the church in question, especially at the special services twice a week. But there is something more these motion pictures can do. They can be used as nearly living sermons on the conditions of life today. If the church attendance has fallen off there is a reason. Pictures of home life of some persons, of the street life of others, may explain why they stay away from church. Again, many good church-going citizens do not know how a considerable portion of their fellow men exist. Perhaps if it is brought to their attention by motion pictures in the pulpit coupled with strong sermons by the pastor the different elements in society may be drawn closer together. The experiment of the Los Angeles preacher is well worth watching closely and copying by the other churches."

How about the exhibitor? The writer interviewed several prominent local exhibitors upon the subject and found them a unit in protesting against the innovation. In the first place, Mr. Reutepohler makes the broad statement that Los Angeles picture theaters are each and all dens of iniquity and wickedness, and that most of the pictures shown are of crime and immoral subjects. This is a gross, prejudicial mis-statement, and is a studied insult to the decent, progressive exhibitors of the city. Los Angeles is freer from this sort of pictures than most other cities, and there has been little complaint regarding such pictures. The local exhibitors as a class are exceptionally discriminatory in their selection of moving pictures and have occasionally returned risque films to the exchanges with the comment that they would not show such pictures in their theaters. Aside from a few tenderloin feature banners, there is no just ground for criticism against the local exhibitors, who are individually and collectively working for the uplift of the business. They declare that if the Rev. Reutepohler wishes to show moving pictures in his church he, too, must comply with the city ordinances, and since the pictures are being in a frame church where the projection machine is not properly protected from the audience, then that is impossible. They also insist that he pay for a city license, and otherwise operate under the same restrictions imposed upon the exhibitor. The Los Angeles exhibitors have paid out hundreds of thousands of dollars in buying leases and equipping theaters and paying high rents. Now they find their investment insecure (provided other churches adopt the idea), because the different churches may purchase machines and by showing free pictures, take away the patronage from the moving picture theater proper. Another moving picture evening was to have been provided at the Salems Congregational Church on Sunday evening, the 2d. The building inspector, however, refused to allow the exhibition to take place on the ground that the pastor had not complied with the city ordinances regarding moving picture shows. The pastor pleaded for a special permit to show the films, but this the inspector refused to grant. The pastor now declares that he is determined to continue with the work and says that he will show pictures if he has to build a brick theater to do it.

Los Angeles Censorship Defeated.—April 1st proved to be quite an April Fool Day for the members of the Civic Association, who early repaired to the council chamber to be present when the Los Angeles censorship ordinance came up for passage. They learned, however, that the proposed ordinance has been abandoned after a thorough examination of conditions in the motion picture theaters by Councilman Andrews, chairman of Legislative Committee, who had the matter in hand, and others. The committee investigated nearly all the theaters in town and in no instance found cause for complaint regarding either management or choice of pictures shown. The writer interviewed Councilman Andrews, who said that the proposed ordinance had been considered by the committee and ordered pigeon-holed, which is an admission that the matter is a closed incident and that the ordinance will not be pushed.

Isis.—The managemers of the Isis (Spring, opposite Mercantile Place) have changed their booking service from Wednesdays and Saturdays to Mondays and Thursdays. The house is now showing three Licensed films.

Clune's.—Clune's Main Street Theater has installed an automatic piano in the Main Street foyer. Both the Main Street and Clune's Broadway are now running continuous instead of their former hours.

Union Dark.—The Union, Main Street between Second and Third, is dark. An attachment for $111.35 has been filed against the theater by the Los Angeles Film Exchange in Justice Summerfield's court. Another attachment for $42 has also been filed by M. J. Le Vie, and both cases will be tried in the same court on April 5th. The proprietors of the Union are C. M. Brockven and his wife, E. I. Brockoven. The house has been using old-run Independent films.

Another New Theater.—The Central Broadway Building Company are altering a store building at 608 South Hill Street at a cost of $3,681, which when completed will be occupied as a moving picture theater. It is rumored that the new house will show Independent films at a five cent admission rate.

Picture Man Injured.—H. Del Ruth, living at Long Beach, while attempting to board a car for Los Angeles on his way to work, missed his hold and was thrown heavily to the street. His injuries consist of bad scalp wounds, severed ear and concussion of the brain. The Pacific Electric Companies' surgeon, who dressed his wounds, found no bones broken, but the patient later developed symptoms of concussion of the brain and became unconscious. Ruth was 25 years of age.

New Beach Theater.—Work has been started at Ocean Park on a new moving picture theater, being erected for Kunkler & Irwin, to be built on Ocean Front near the corner of Kinney Street. The new house will cost $15,000 and will be ready to open by May 30th, the opening of the beach season.

Pictures for the Poor.—For the past five years, Mrs. A. I. Bradley, in charge of juvenile work among the foreigners at the Bethelehem Institute, has given a stereopticon picture show every Sunday evening to a large audience of children. Women come with babies in their arms, and sometimes men join in the company. Lately she has added moving pictures to the other attractions, and they have proven so popular that she never lacks a crowded audience.

Editorial.—The following editorial appeared in the Los Angeles "Record" under date of March 29th: "It is said that the moving picture is not so popular as it was. If that be true, it is not the fault of the public, but of the show. Nothing that recent times have given us is richer in possibilities of refined entertainment and even valuable education than the moving pictures. Science, travel, history, the masterpieces of literature—all these can be placed before the eyes and planted in the minds of the masses at trifling cost by this marvelous device. But the enterprising gentlemen who supply the films appear to think the public wants little or nothing that is really good or inspiring. They sit up nights plotting revolting tragedies, exaggerated melodramas and Sunday-supplement comedy to feed our boys and girls. The moving picture show should be preserved for the good it may do, even if the public has to buy it up and supply it as freely as it now does the common school education. As now conducted, it is long on chaff and short on wheat."

To Find Wire Size.—St. Louis, Mo., writes: "The wires coming into my booth are supposed to be No. 4. They are, however, of the stranded variety. How can I measure these wires and ascertain positively whether or not they really are No. 4?"

With a standard B & S wire gauge, measure one of the strands. In the wire table of any standard work on wiring, find out how many circular mills there are in a wire the size of the strand measured. Multiply this number of circular mills by the number of strands in the wire and the product will be the total number of circular mills in all the strands; or, in other words, the total number of circular mills in the cable. By reference to the tables you will find that a No. 4 wire contains 41,616 circular mills, which, of course, will be the number of circular mills in the combined strands of your cable, if it is a No. 4. If it is a No. 6, it will contain 26,244 circular mills, while a No. 5 will contain 32,124. The diameter of the wire strand may be measured with a micrometer caliper, a "mill" being .1,000 of an inch.

Light Trouble and Valuable Recipes.—Can you tell me what is the trouble with my light? I use 110 volt, 60 cycle A. C.; Hadfield & Hall current reducer; Arco carbons. Light burns good at times and then flickers so that I can only control it by bringing the carbons almost together; upon separating them again it does the same. The spot at the gate almost always shows double. The current is poor. In the afternoons the voltage goes so low one can scarcely get any light at all. What condenser should I use for 76 ft. throw with 12 ft. picture, 6 inch E. F. objective lens? The field is not clear. I tried two 6½ and have 6½ and 7½ in now. Have moved the lamp house back and forth. How do you take up end motion in the Powers No. 6? Machine shaft end near balance wheel is wedge shape, or, when turned one part seems out more than the other—intermittent sprocket I should have said. I am sending you a recipe for coloring lights; also one for slides. To color lights (I presume you mean electric light globes—Ed.) use white shellac thinned with denatured alcohol. Have light connected up and current on when dipped, so that it will dry at once. Use dyes for colors. White shellac and denatured alcohol make a frosted globe. I cannot give the exact quantity of each, but have used it and know it will work. It won't wash off. To make slides, dissolve a piece of white rosin about the size of a walnut in one pint of gasoline. Pour, or better still use a white soft brush and give a slide cover glass one thin coat. It dries in a few minutes. Gasoline will clean them. You can write on them same as on paper.

While I cannot say positively, Ohio, I am pretty sure your double spot is due to not using heavy enough amperage. The flicker you speak of is probably what occurs with carbons having a poor core. I do not know that this is the trouble in your case, but that is exactly what happens when you strike a carbon with bad core. With a 6 inch E. F. lens you should use not less than two 7½ inch condensers, but you should have those condensers so placed that their convex surfaces are almost in contact with each other. As to the shaft in the No. 6, you will have to describe that trouble a little better. I do no understand what you are driving at. Which shaft, or shafts, has end motion? As to the recipes, I pass them on to our readers for experiment. If they work out right they are certainly of great value.

Lens Problem.—New York City writes: "Kindly let me have your advice on the following: I am using 220 volt 60 cycle A. C. through a compensare, 14, 40 and 60 ampere contacts. Have one 6½ and one 7½ inch condenser. The machine is an Edison two-pin converted to one pin. The throw is 80 feet and the picture 12 ft 3½ ins wide by 9 ft. 0½ ins. high. I get an excellent focus, in fact, better than I have seen any place I have been. I expect to have a throw of 105 feet and would like to project about the same size picture—no larger. Could I use the same lens, and would the same size condensers be right? I have a small stereo picture now. How much larger will it be with the longer throw? My machine makes a terrible racket. All parts are seemingly in good condition. There is no lost motion between the star and cam and no tightening. The picture is as steady as a rock. I have got into the habit of putting a drop of oil on the cam pin before it enters the star slot every time I run a picture. I run six reels in the afternoon and 12 in the evening and never have any occasion to 'chase them.' I do not use the 60 ampere contact on the compensare because I cannot control the light and it makes too much noise. Will I have to use it on the longer throw? That was some meeting Monday night."

No, New York, you cannot use the same lens. The lens you now have is about (without figuring it out) a 4 inch E F lens. To project a picture 12 ft. wide at 105 ft., you would have to have a very long lens indeed; in fact, about 8 inch E F It is figured as follows: Multiply the throw in feet by the exact width of the aperature, measuring the same with an inside caliper, and divide this product by the width of the picture in feet. This will give you the equivalent focus of the required lens. For such a small picture on such a long throw as that I would recommend that you procure a half size projection lens by all means. The Nicholas Power Company have them for sale, especially made to screw into the face plate of a moving picture machine. Possibly the other machine manufacturers also have them; I cannot say. You should use not less than two 7½ inch condensers with such a long focal length objective lens. As to the noise in your machine you will have to describe it accurately before I can offer you any help. You will not need any more light on the 105 ft. throw than you use on the 50 ft. The added distance will make no difference in that respect. It is the size of picture that governs the amount of light necessary. If you increase the size of the picture you will necessarily have to increase the amperage in order to secure the same curtain brilliancy. There is no reason why the stereo picture size should be increased on the longer throw. You will have to get a new lens, so why not get one to give the same size (if it suits) on the longer throw? Yes, the meeting of the Union last Monday night was very encouraging, indeed. To find what width picture your present stereo lens would give at 105 ft. proceed as follows: Find exact width of present picture in inches. Divide this by the present throw in feet. This gives number of inches the light spreads to each foot of throw. Multiply the last result by 105 and result will be width of picture (in inches) the lens will project at 105 ft.

Ghostly Questions.—Savannah, Ill., writes: I am going to ask you a few questions about ghosts. I am using a Vitascope machine on a 43 ft throw with 10 ft. picture. From lamp to machine is 24 inches. Have used several lenses, but all work the same. I am using 6½ in. condensers; can change the ghost from the center to side of picture. I have tried all ways I can think of to take the ghost out, but it still remains. What is wrong?

First try two 7½ in. condensers, setting them, if possible, so that their convex surfaces will almost be in contact. I mean almost in contact at the thickest part of the lens. You say it is 24 ins. from lamp to machine. If you mean 24 ins. from the arc to the aperture, the distance is excessive and you have something to do with the ghost. Try moving the lamp house up closer, if the condensers do not make the difficulty. If neither one of these things does the trick, then look to the setting of your carbons. I am of the opinion, however, that the trouble will be found in the position of the lamp house, which is very far away for the use of 6½ in condensers. Be sure that everything is set exact, one from the arc to the front end of the projection lens. In one of these ways you will undoubtedly find your trouble.

Wonder What He Really Did?—Mr. Wm. Fulverts, West Ill., writes: "Enclosed find check for $1 to for Handbook. I certainly enjoy the Trouble Department and think it is great. Recently you instructed that condensers should be about ⅛ in. apart. I took mine out and placed them in that way, but could not get good light at all. I pushed the lamp house back and forth, the arc closer and farther back, but could not get good results. The two lenses are about ¾ in. thick at the center and about the same diameter. I have a 6x8 ft. throw and a 14½ ft. picture. 110 volt 60 cycle A. C. with about 35 amperes at the arc. Have ordered an Edison economizer, latest pattern, but have not installed same as yet. Can you tell me why this condenser stunt would not work?"

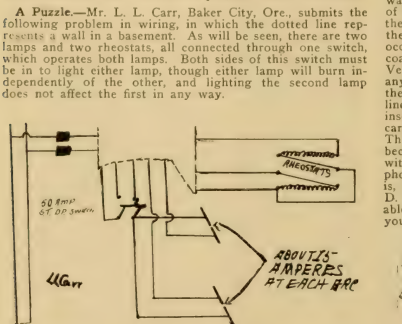
I do not know why it would not work. Friend Folkerts, because I do not know what you actually did. You say you "took them out and put them in that way." It all depends on what you mean by that. The relation of the condensers to each other would not be changed in any way, except that they would be moved closer together. If you did that and kept the lenses square with each other, with the convex surfaces facing each other on the inside, I know of no reason on earth why the result should not be as good as it was before and there are reasons why it should be considerably better.

Choke Coil.—Moriarty & Gillis, Holyoke, Mass., write: "Kindly tell us how much No. 4 wire will be required to build a choke coil to deliver 45 amperes on 110 volts."

No, gentlemen, I cannot. Nor can any one else without knowing the size and kind of core you propose to use. Even with that data at hand the problem would be difficult.

A Puzzle.—Mr. L. L. Carr, Baker City, Ore., submits the following problem in wiring, in which the dotted line represents a wall in a basement. As will be seen, there are two lamps and two rheostats, all connected through one switch, which operates both lamps. Both sides of this switch must be in to light either lamp, though either lamp will burn independently of the other, and lighting the second lamp does not affect the first in any way.



Neighbor Carr has sent in a solution of this matter, which is the wiring diagram of a stereopticon he found in his present place of employment when he took the position as operator. Readers of the Department are invited to submit their solution of the puzzle. Please draw all sketches in black ink if they are designed for publication without re-drawing.

Some Few Stunts.—Mr. Oscar W. Lewis, Glenwood Springs, Colo., writes: "Some time ago I promised you the description of a few stunts with which I am acquainted, and I hand you herewith a little bundle to square myself. (1) Arc screen: Make a tin frame 1½ ins. square (see sketch) to hold a piece of ground glass. I say ground glass for the reason that plain glass will reflect a double image. If you cannot get ground glass, it may easily be made by grinding a piece of plain glass with emery or sand paper on a flat board, or with a piece of fine emery cloth or paper. Grind thoroughly with a circular motion. Place glass in frame and bolt frame to door in such a way that when in operating position you can see the center of the reflector through the center of the peep-hole. Turn on arc and while burning adjust the frame so that you can see in the ground glass a reflection of the crater in the condenser. That is to say, not the crater itself, but the image of the crater reflected from the condenser and re-reflected by the ground glass mirror. You will find that this shows the carbon tips right side up as though you were looking through the center of the condenser mount. You can watch with perfect ease every change of the arc and tell at a glance whether or no the lamp needs trimming. This arc reflector is the most practical of any that I have ever seen. (2) If your booth is a long way from the screen, a cheap field glass is very handy to focus with. And by the way, why are so many pictures out of focus? Simply because the focusing ring is in such position that the operator cannot get hold of the ring while running. I have overcome this difficulty by making a handle of spring steel, or brass, bent in such way as to bring it within reach of the hand (see sketch). With this handle, in connection with a prism binocular, I can keep the picture in perfect focus at all times. A handy way to change the color of the spot light is to pick out of a set of song slides a number of slides containing each a space about one inch square of one solid color. Hold the slide in the narrowest part of the beam of light, being careful not to leave it in too long or it will crack. In this way, if careful, you can produce some pleasing results. However, every operator should have a set of tint slides, which may be made by fixing several lantern slide plates in a solution of hypo-soda until all milkiness disappears, then tinting to the desired tone in a bath of diamond dyes or any other kind of aniline coloring. Wash the slide for one hour in running water before tinting. Make one pale blue slide to be placed in a carrier to color black and white films blue, where the scene represents a night scene. It is an easy matter to make a movable spot light, if you need one. Simply make a hole in one corner of a piece of tin, cut the same size as a slide, and place it in the carrier in such a way that the hole will be in the upper right hand corner of the left hand slide holder. Then place a solid tin slide in the right hand section of the slide carrier and by moving the carrier you can move the spot clear across the space occupied by the picture. To make an announcement slide, coat a plain cover glass evenly with a thin paste made of Venetian Red and water. (Venetian Red may be had at any druggist's). Let this coat become thoroughly dry and then with a sharp pencil, using a second glass to guide the lines of writing and protect the glass you are writing on, inscribe any matter you may wish in the coat of paint. Be careful not to get the coating too thick, or it will chip. This slide must be protected with a cover, glass, or it will become damaged. If you get a film without a title, or with a short one, an excellent substitute can be made by photographing the poster and making a lantern slide; that is, if you are an amateur photographer. If you are using D. C. and the current fluctuates, you can make an adjustable rheostat by hooking up switches (see sketch), enabling you to cut out part of a coil or a whole coil, which will aid you in keeping a perfect light. Place the rheostat outside of the booth and the switches at any convenient point near the machine.

"If you haven't a film moisture tank an excellent substitute is to place one or two moist blotters in the can with the film during the day. An excellent gear lubricant is cup grease, to be had at any hardware store or garage. It doesn't get thin and run off like vaseline. It should be used straight for cam and star, but works better on the gears when mixed with graphite. Do not use this on the lamp. We are putting it all over the trust house, spoken of in my last letter, with our Independent service and a Power's No. 6. This is the end for this time. If you want more, say so."

Well, Neighbor Lewis, you have certainly sent in a bunch, and squared yourself good and plenty. As to the arc screen, I take it from what you say that the reflector is attached to inside lamp house door from which the ruby glass would, I presume, have to be removed. If this is not right, kindly advise us; I assume this from the fact that you say "you can see the center of the reflector through the center of the peep-hole." The stunt looks to me like a novel and a good one. Another good stunt is to fix a piece of ruby glass over the air vent in condenser mount and you will get a perfect image of the arc in miniature. That focusing with a telescope brought a smile to my countenance, but nevertheless I think a good opera glass or binocular, as you suggest, could be used for this purpose to good advantage, though, truth to tell, such a thing had never before entered my head. That focusing handle stunt is excellent where an outside shutter is used. The tint slide proposition is all right, but where colored glass of proper shade can be had it is much better. Friend Lewis sent a postcard correction to the above reading: "The field glass should be hung on a suitable arm, which can be swung out of the way and should be attached to arm in such manner as to enable its being directed to any part of the picture."

The rheostat puzzled me for a moment, but I see that to increase the current flow the switches are thrown in one after the other, from left t right, the maximum amperage being had when all switches are in. Come again, friend Lewis.

Several Questions.—Iowa Falls, Ia., writes: "Find enclosed $1.50 for Handbook. I am an ardent admirer of The Moving Picture World. You certainly take great pains to help operators and managers. I have a Pathe machine and a current reducer. Have a 54 ft. throw; use regular 4½ in. lenses; have a 9 x 12½ curtain; have used the two leading brands of carbons, but neither are satisfactory to me with A. C. I have much trouble eliminating ghost from the center of the picture. My picture is too large for the screen. Will it be necessary to get a new lens? I have considerable difficulty with my carbons. Sometimes 'blubbers' form, causing tits to form. Could it be that I have too much or too little current? I have a Pittsburg economy coil. Can you explain how to operate same correctly? What per cent. of Independent films are non-inflammable?"

We are glad you like the World and the Department, Iowa Falls. I do not think the trouble is in the make of carbons. I do not know what you mean by "blubbers." Neither do I know what you mean by "tits," as they are formed only when D. C. is used, being a cap of graphite on the negative carbon. You will have to describe this a little more fully. You might carefully pack a carbon point showing the fault, and mail to me, if you care to. As to the ghost in the center of the picture, that may be due to: (a) Wrong focal length condenser; (b) lamp house too far away or too close to machine; (c) Carbons not set right. I think one 6½ and one 7½ in. condenser would be about right for you. In this I am not speaking of the diameter of the lenses, but of their focal length. Yes, you will have to get a new lens, but your exchange will probably fix you up in that matter at small cost. You probably be able to furnish a second hand lens, taking yours in exchange. There is not much danger of your having too much current with A. C.; you may, however, easily have too little. I am not acquainted with the Pittsburg economy coil; therefore, sorry to say, I cannot give you any information concerning its manipulation. Most of the Independent film manufacturers are now using the Eastman non-inflammable stock and those that are not using it at present have contracted for quantities of it for early delivery.

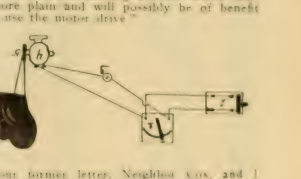
Poor Manufacturers' Patches.—Mr. E. B. Stone, Athens, Ga., writes: "I am sending samples of film that you may see the trouble I have had with certain makes of film. These all came loose on my first run and before the day was out it was my pleasure to patch them. I must say that many times I had to re-make every patch the manufacturer had made. Cannot the film manufacturers use a good cement and stop this nuisance? It is hard for the operator to keep his temper when his film is breaking one or more times every show. Acetic ether, acetone and flexible collodion make a punk cement for N. I. film, and that is what I understand the General Film Company uses. If they will dissolve a little N. I. film in acetic ether and acetone, I guarantee this nuisance will be eliminated. It is not every film that has this fault, but it happens quite often with all makes of Licensed goods. After looking at the splices submitted, do you wonder that we complain? We run third-day films now, but I have run first releases and have had as many as 10 breaks in one film. What do you think of splitting the cam bushing on an Edison machine, thereby enabling one to take up all lost motion caused by the wear of the bearings? I have been using mine this way and find my machine runs almost noiseless, where before it made a lot of fuss."

Neighbor Stone submitted twelve patches, all of them, beyond question, manufacturers' patches which bore evidence of either exceeding carelessness in joining, or a mighty poor cement; probably the latter. I, too, have in the past, experienced difficulty with this very same proposition and have had as many as five or six manufacturers' patches come loose in one first-run film. It is more than a nuisance, it is an outrage, and one which manufacturers will do well to eliminate. I have taken the matter up with the manufacturers of the film from which the splices submitted came and they have promised to look after the matter more closely in the future. As to splitting the cam bushing, there is no reason why that stunt would not work all right, provided the machine be in the hands of a careful man. I don't think, however, I would recommend it to be practised by anybody and everybody, for several reasons, one of which is that after the bushing has been split and squeezed it will no longer fit the hole in the casting, being oval instead of round, and held only by a bearing on one side of the casting and a set screw on the other.

Advice On Health.—Mr. C. Earl Mooney, Norwood, O., writes: "Find enclosed $1.50 for Operators' Handbook. I have heard it spoken of with the highest approval and think it is time I procured a copy. I find the Department very interesting. Have read numerous articles on the care and handling of films as regards their life, and I think it is time something be said from the point of health and sanitation for the benefit of those who handle the films. The Union doctor here in Cincinnati is a personal friend of mine, and in a little chat one day he told me of the danger of being cut with films; also of the danger of being inoculated with the germs of contagious diseases. In speaking of being cut with film, I refer to the practice of placing the thumb and forefinger on the edge to detect the bad places when inspecting. The films carry disease germs readily and these germs may be taken into the system by wetting the end of the film with the tongue to facilitate removal of emulsion, a habit of some operators in making patches or; by being cut while inspecting, as above set forth. A remedy for the one is two strips of adhesive plaster over the thumb and forefinger, which same may be easily removed when through inspecting and laid aside for future use. A remedy for the other is a small sponge and a receptacle filled with water. Heat is a germ destroyer in certain ways, but even the intense heat at the aperture is insufficient to destroy germ life. At this time I have in mind the case of an operator up in Cincinnati (Norwood is a suburb of Cincinnati—Ed.) who contracted what was thought to be smallpox, but later developed into chicken pox, caused by wetting the end of the film with the tongue while making a patch. He was unable to work for something like three weeks. I trust the foregoing will meet with your approval and be of benefit to others."

Anything that is for the interest and benefit of the business, or the men engaged therein, is of interest to me, Friend Mooney, and will meet with my approval every time. The custom of wetting the stub end of the film with the tongue is undoubtedly to some extent dangerous, and also undoubtedly it is anything but cleanly; still, it is the quickest way, and the way the average operator does it. Like many other things, he "gets used to it" after a while and does not think anything of it. The writer has cut himself many times on the films and realizes that contraction of disease through such a cut would be quite within the range of possibility, though fortunate enough to escape.

Motor Drive.—Mr. Geo. Cox, Joplin, Mo., writes: "Some time ago I sent in a sketch showing how to hitch up machine and motor, but I guess it was too roughly drawn to be understood. I am, therefore, sending another which will I presume, be more plain and will possibly be of benefit to operators who use the motor drive."



I remember your former letter, Neighbor Cox, and I wrote you immediately, asking for a better sketch, as I was unable to understand the one you sent. It was roughly drawn, all right. In fact I think you must have drawn that particular sketch with a meat axe, but the present effort is excellent and, as you say, it will doubtless be of interest and value to operators using the motor. Neighbor Cox says he can furnish the reducing gear to any operator who can not get one at $6.00. In the sketch, w is a switch, z is 3½ ampere D. C. rheostat, h is a snap switch, a is h. p. motor, s, a 4 in. pulley hand motor to reducing gear, z a 2 in. pulley on machine crank shaft.

Projecting Living Figures.—Mr. C. F. De Soria, New York City, formerly electrician of the Hippodrome, is owner of Patent No. 923,209, the same being an apparatus for projecting images of living objects on screens. A sketch of the invention is shown, in which the young lady is lying on top of the machine, her head protruding down into the chamber.

The face would be perfectly projected on the screen life sized, in natural colors. Mr. De Soria also builds a machine of sufficient size for a man or woman, to stand in the chamber, in which is seen the woman's head, and the whole figure will be projected. The man or woman can be seated, drawing pictures or doing anything else, and the projection will be perfect. This is a novelty which ought to and undoubtedly will take hugely. It is not an experiment, but has been tried out in actual practice and has proven successful. Sketch 30 denotes a screen of cloth, gauze, glass or other material adapted to receive the image of whatever may be inserted into the opening 8. Light rays may escape from the chamber through lens 5. The patent paper reads: "My invention admits of many and varied uses, such, for instance, as the illusion of bodies floating in the air; ghostly effect, by throwing the image on a transparent screen; the effect of bringing pictures or statues to life by making the image of a living object a part of the painted scene, and other uses too numerous to mention herein, but which will be obvious to those familiar with stage settings and effects."

Several Questions.—New York City writes: "Handbook received and it is worth many times its price. We should have more works of this kind. (1) Can you give me a formula for curtain coating, so that the pictures can be seen from the back of the screen. (2) From a January number of the World I see that an operator may use up to 45 amperes if proper connections are made. How can we use 45 amperes if we are not allowed to use anything but a 25 ampere rheostat and 30 ampere fuses? (3) The Edison Company have certain hours during which they put extra power (current) on their lines between 42d Street and 96th Street, and during certain hours they take off that extra current. With a 25 ampere, 110 volt rheostat we cannot get a good light until about 4 P. M.; then the light is good for the rest of the evening until 11 o'clock, after which the same trouble is again encountered. What is the remedy? Can you give me the name and address of the best Union in New York? Are they doing real work, or will it be a failure as in the past? How about the films in which we find four or five mis-frames—not in the patching, but in the printing?"

(1) No; I cannot. It would have to be some kind of a coating resembling ground glass. I believe I would try—and in fact, I think I shall try—the solution given in another part of this week's Department for coating electric light globes. Anything that is fairly transparent and will diffuse light will serve the purpose. Suppose you coat a small piece of canvas with that solution and try it out, reporting results, if you will. (2) There have been some recent changes in the rules of the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity. The assurance from the Department that the operator would be allowed to use 45 amperes, provided all appliances were large enough, was absolute. There were no "if's" and "an's" about it. I had positive assurance that, if all appliances, such as switches, wires, etc., were of sufficient size 45 amperes of current could be used. If this is true, then most certainly it follows that you must be allowed to use rheostats and fuses capable of delivering that amperage. I have been told that the Department "had it in for me" for publishing that statement; but as to the truth of that assertion, I do not know. Right is right, and I again repeat that there is neither reason nor common sense in limiting the amperage to 30, or even 45, for that matter. It is not done in Chicago or any other city in this country, while in England and Germany the common practice is to use from 75 to 90 amperes for projecting moving pictures, while in Australia as much as 100 amperes are used, the carbons being larger than we use, of course. I understand that there is considerable objection raised to the use of cartridge fuses and that the desire of the Department was to limit amperage on account of the regular plug fuse not being available in the 45 ampere size. I understand also that to get around this the rule has been made, or is in contemplation, ordering replacement of both plug and cartridge operating room fuses by link fuses. If this is true (I do not yet know positively that it is) it is a move in the right direction. The link fuse is the logical operating room fuse, when properly protected by a glass or mica cap, or enclosed in a metal cabinet. The objection to the cartridge fuse is the ease with which a copper jumper is put in, this proving a constant temptation to the operator to "boost" his fuses—a thing thoroughly reprehensible from any and every point of view. (3) I suppose what you mean is that the Edison Company increases the voltage during certain hours. In this I think you must be mistaken, though it is possible that during certain hours the lines are overloaded, thus causing a drop in voltage. If this is the condition there is no remedy, excepting the increasing of the generating machinery, or of the wires; that is, if the wires are too small for the load. The latter, however, is not likely. As to the name and address of the best Union, I will say that the office of the business agent of the only official Union there is, is in the building on northwest corner Broadway and 40th Street; entrance on 40th Street. The telephone number is Bryant 1915. The Union has recently developed phenomenal activity and promises to be a useful factor in future. Whether it will go forward to ultimate success or not depends, of course, altogether on the membership. Personally I hope and believe it will and would advise your joining the organization. As to the mis-frames you speak of, I think that trouble has been done away with. You refer, I presume, to a certain make of Independent film which has given much trouble in that respect in the past. I had the matter up with them recently and was assured that no future releases would have that most serious of faults.

Rheostat Wires.—Mr. Richard W. Mayfield, Giddings, Tex., encloses $1.50 for Handbook and writes: "Our operator, Mr. Howard, is a jeweler and a mechanician and is able to adjust almost anything that goes wrong with our machine. The three whose names appear at the head of this sheet own the business and run it as a sort of 'hobby' or side line. We are not getting rich in the picture business, but we are, however, having lots of pleasure. Mr. Howard states he is unable to get his light as clear as he wishes. Being an optician and jeweler, he is somewhat of a crank on the subject of projection. He wants you to tell us how to avoid the ghost in the center of the screen. Our screen is immovable, painted an absolute white with Muru-co. We try to make all proper adjustments with the machine, but are troubled with the ghost. We use A. C. 110 volts from a 60 K. W., 60 cycle generator, single phase 900 R. P. M., with rheostat to reduce current; flat sided, soft cored carbons; throw 60 ft.; picture 10½ ft.; condensers, one 7½ and the other 8. We have tried placing the condensers 1/16 of an inch apart, and also ⅛ of an inch apart. Formerly had them ½ inch apart, but we got the ghost just the same. Our rheostat is adjustable; our carbons stand pointing to each other in a straight line at an angle of about 20 degs. from vertical, the lower carbon being placed slightly in advance of the upper. Our rheostat is wound with about No. 14 wire. Mr. Howard thinks that the wire on the rheostat is too small. Our current comes in the house on No. 6 or No. 8 wire and we use a 75 ampere switch. Wires to lamp are asbestos covered with about No. 6 or 8. In other words, all wires, except the rheostat, are 6 or 8, while the rheostat winding is 14 or 16. Now, tell us our trouble and how to cure it."

Well, Friend Mayfield, you certainly have given me a bundle of data all right, all right, even to the revolutions of the dynamo armature. I am inclined to think the ghost in the center of the screen lies in one of two things: Either the lower carbon is advanced just a little too much, so that it comes up a little in front of the upper carbon crater, the ghost being its shadow, or else the ghost is by reason of the fact that the lamp house is too close to or too far away from the machine. Your condenser sizes are all right and presumably, Mr. Howard being an optician and mechanician, the outfit is in a line throughout. I am, therefore, quite sure that the ghost is due to one of those two things. As to the wires on the rheostat, I notice you are not exact in this matter, saying that the lead wires are No. 8 or No. 6 and the rheostat wires No. 14 or No. 16. The size of the wires on the rheostat would be governed by the number of amperes you are pulling. Presumably this would not be less than 30, in which case a No. 16 or even a No. 14 rheostat wire would get very hot unless these wires are double. I am wondering if you have not got one of those old style Edison drum rheostats which were wound with about No. 16 or No. 14 wires; but those wires were double, two running side by side. There, however, is not much use discussing this matter, since the rheostat wires are all right as long as they do not get red hot while delivering the required and desired amperage. If they show signs of redness then the wires are too small to carry the current. I am glad to know Mr. Howard is a crank on projection; I am one myself. Shake, Neighbor Howard.

An Address.—Hartsburg, Ill., writes: Please send me the recipe for metal curtain coating as mentioned in column one, page 531, March 11 issue. If not too much trouble, please send me the addresses of moving picture magazines in the United States and England and oblige."

As to the recipe, Friend Hartsburg, I am unable to find the letter from Delaware and hereby request that he send in his address again, as I had another request for it just a few days ago. I put that particular letter to one side so that I could lay my hand on it, and when I went to do so there was nothing doing. Delaware will please send in his address at once and I will then forward it to you, Hartsburg. As to the moving picture magazines, since the "Nickelodeon" of Chicago went out of business the Moving Picture World is the only one left in this country. True, there is a publication owned by some of the Licensed film manufacturers, also one that groveles to the Motion Picture Sales Company, but as these are merely to all intents and purposes, bulletins to boost the business and fight the battles of a particular clique, or rather two particular cliques, they could not be considered as true moving picture journals. There are two leading English journals, namely Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly, Tottenham Street, Tottenham Court Road, London W., and The Bioscope, 88 Shaftsbury Ave, London W.

Focusing Light.—Saginaw, Mich., sends in a drawing of a light designed to be located in front of the objective lens, used for the purpose of focusing the film in his lamp, as designed by Saginaw, is pulled into position by a treadle arrangement, making automatic contact with the current wires. When through threading, a movement of the treadle tips the lamp out of the way. The idea is excellent, but to properly explain the same would require four good sized cuts, taking up considerably more than half a page of the paper. This would be not only expensive in cost, but expensive in space, more so, if you will pardon me, Saginaw, than the importance of the device justifies, although, as I said before, the idea is a good one. The same thing, however, can be accomplished in quite a number of ways, one or two of which have already been published. Therefore, I trust you will forgive me for not taking up so much space publishing the illustrations of this device at this time.

More About the Carbon Test.—San Francisco submits the following: "Replying to your request for further information, page 596, March 18 issue, will say that, for example, when we are pulling, under normal conditions, 20 amperes, by putting in two green carbons, after bringing them together and separating again far enough so that the arc will not sing, I find the ammeter shows a pull of about 48 amperes and the needle gradually moves back to 20 when the current has formed and the arc is burning correctly, this taking about one and one-half minutes. Therefore, if we are using 25 or 30 ampere fuses on 20 amperes, they will blow out very shortly. This, I trust, will clear up my former letter. I will come again if you want any more. You are at liberty to change my explanation to suit yourself, if you deem it necessary."

No, Frisco, I do not see any necessity in changing anything. The explanation taken in conjunction with your former letter, page 596, is perfectly clear, though it hardly seems possible there would be such a tremendous drop in amperage as all that. We shall be glad indeed to hear from you on any other subject of interest or on the same subject again, for that matter, if you have more interesting data.

"Priscilla and the Umbrella" (Biograph).—This film shows one of the most attractive comedies, seen in some time. It is another episode in Paul's life and shows how much of a "boob" he is. Perhaps the most interesting feature of it is the clever way Priscilla makes his own executioner of him, while he brings Harry to Priscilla's side. The way the umbrella is decorated and made an object of adoration is a delicious bit of work. The acting is above the ordinary, while the photography is as clear as it could be. The picture is a welcome addition to the list of comedies.

"The Wife's Awakening" (Lubin).—In this domestic story, a former lover figures to some extent, though he does not wreck the home. The husband's pleasant surprise when he returns long afterward is the feature of the drama. Aside from that it is no more than an ordinary story.

"The Apple of His Eye" (Pathe).—We have in this film a story of a count's daughter who wanders away and is discovered years afterward the wife of a gypsy and refuses to go home without her husband. There is some altercation about the matter and the gypsy nearly gets arrested when he makes an attempt to see his wife, but everything ends happily, with the count, his daughter, grandson and son-in-law dwelling together in unity under one roof.

"The Fortune Hunters" (Selig).—This is a society comedy drama. It depicts, with a good deal of animation, the adventures of two bogus counts who search for marriageable daughters of wealthy people. They find them, but are put out of business just as they lead their brides to the altar. Perhaps the best part of the comedy is the wedding scene where the girls change bridegrooms quite as though it were the proper thing to do. The film has no notable features, but is lively and entertaining.

"Monsieur" (Edison).—A touching, yet forceful, play. It has one scene which is notably dramatic. To find the father of the girl he hopes to win, a waiter in a fashionable café is the situation which confronts a refined young American. Equal to the occasion he has the waiter join the party as a guest and makes it a betrothal supper. The scene showing the discovery of the father will linger long in the memory. It shows clearly how wealthy folk may come to hard times and as clearly that bad luck doesn't always last forever. Many things in America require quick action; in this play the young man's resourcefulness is a feature which counts for much. The drama is perfectly staged and the photography is clear. The picture is above the average release in its dramatic force and its mechanical work.

"Caught With the Goods" (Essanay).—This lively comedy illustrates the experiences of a man who finds himself compelled to spend a few weeks in jail and tries to fool his wife into believing he has been called away to Mexico for thirty days. The mixup at the end is funny and then comes forgiveness, which is quite essential in this situation.

"The Letter With the Red Seal" (Gaumont).—Imagine being on ship board and finding that a letter which you had carried to the ship's captain gave directions to kill your husband as soon as the ship reached a certain latitude and longitude, then you can form some conception of the interesting complication which is admirably developed in this film. Pirates appear at the moment of the execution and the condemned man proves himself in the ensuing fight so brave that his life is spared and his noble actions win him a pardon. The story is good and is well told, while the photography of the ship at sea is excellent mechanical work.

"The City of Amalfi, Italy" (Gaumont).—An excellent film, gives good pictures of the Italian coast from Vietry to Amalfi. The pictorial work could scarcely be improved. The picturesque views were selected by an artist and all the work of making this film was quite as well performed.

"An Unexpected Review" (Vitagraph).—This comedy represents the difficulties which came to a party of soldiers who were holding a banquet with the servants in the kitchen while the general and the governor with a brilliant company were dining upstairs. The kitchen presented a rather uninviting appearance when the upstairs party went down to investigate, but all the soldiers were marched off in good order. The audience testifies to its pleasure in a forcible manner.

"The Broken Cross" (Biograph).—Here is one of those simple heart-stories which always seem to please. The young man leaves his country sweetheart with a portion of the cross. Another girl almost wins him away, but he discovers that the piece of cross she sends him does not fit and sees into her deception. It isn't much of a story, yet it has a fascination because it is a representation of what might actually occur. Sometimes such simple stories attract more that stronger ones.

"His Best Girl After All" (Lubin).—This film gives a sort of sermon, or warning, to men not to leave their wives for the society of other women. If ever one was as vigorously punished in reality as this one was in his dream it is quite likely he would desist from such attentions. The picture is lively, but possesses no dramatic interest.

"A Visit to Nassau, Bahama" (Lubin).—A travelog; it gives good illustrations of the scenery on the Bahama Islands and the people who live there. The picturesque coast is attractive and there is an element of novelty in the moderate slow-going movements of the people which seem strange to Northern eyes. The continuous smoking is a feature which adds to the individuality of the film. The photography is mostly well done.

"Her Faithful Heart" (Melies).—This film shows a love story. In it the machinations of fate are strongly pictured. All sorts of difficulties are thrown in the way of the young man, even to the taking away of his good name, but because of an accident, supposed to be fatal, the culprit confesses, the young man is exonerated and true love flows smoother afterward. The picture is exciting in places and tells an excellent story, but it is scarcely dramatic in its appeal. However, it is one of the kind an audience likes. The audience plainly manifested its pleasure.

"Red's Conquest" (Selig).—We have here a Nevada story with characteristic Nevada scenery as background and setting. The thrilling rescue from a theater fire of a woman and child and the subsequent love story are all plainly told. The rescue is a good bit of work and adds materially to the film's dramatic qualities. The mechanical part has been done with attention to detail, consequently the picture has many claims for success.

"Nell's Last Deal" (Edison).—In this tale of gambling den and mining camp, we have an element not usually seen in such stories, a sort of Sunday School attachment which seems to indicate that even gamblers and miners may be glad to come to Sunday School when there is a pretty girl mixed up in the proceedings. When one man doesn't like his neighbor's "golden text," he pulls a gun on him and makes him sit down. Of course a love story develops; and when the problem of disposing of two men that she might accept the third arises, it is successfully solved by a card deal with a trick in it; it's the Sunday School teacher's trick, too. That is why it is named "Nell's Last Deal." However this may be, the matter is satisfactorily settled and the girl gets the man she wants. Whether it is wholly desirable to mingle mining and gambling with Sunday Schools and Bibles, is perhaps best left to the audience to decide for itself. It may be pointed out, though, that there is a certain degree of danger in this combination which, under some circumstances, might cause difficulty. Anything which savors of religion must be introduced with extreme care and probably a considerable proportion of the thinking members of an audience will agree that these suggestions do not add strength to a picture of this character.

"Big-Hearted Jim" (Kalem).—The village girl leaves "Blacksmith" Jim, accepts the city man and the usual result follows; she is turned out doors with her baby by her worthless husband. Then follow a series of complications, ending with an involved love story, rather difficult to understand. The lapse of years must be great, since later Jim's mining partner is made to fall in love with the baby girl, grown-up. She had been left by her mother with Jim.

"The Three Whiffles" (Pathe).—In this trick picture appear three men looking exactly alike. The parts are all played by one man, even though there are scenes where all three of them appear together. The story is written for the purpose of exploiting this peculiar idea and does it well. The father and his twin sons all looking alike, create a good deal of fun before they are done and vanish.

"Native Industries in Cochin-China" (Pathe).—A good pic ture; it shows some of the country and the people of that far off land busy about their various occupations. The photography is clear and the representation of native arts and occupations forms an interesting industrial film.

"For His Sake," or "The Winning of the Stepchildren" (Vitagraph).—This film gives a play showing how a stepmother undertook to win the love of the children of the man she was to marry and how well she succeeded. The novel idea might not be practicable in real life, yet, because it presents one view of a domestic problem it possesses interest. It is a simple home play that will please many.

"The Sheriff's Chum" (Essanay).—A thrilling Western drama; it depicts in a forcible manner the perfidy of a man who lost his sweetheart and his later attempts to compromise her and induce her to go away with him. Perhaps one of the most satisfactory scenes in a long time is the pummeling he gets when her husband returns and sees what the wretch is doing. It is rough work, but it is salutary and will be applauded by a considerable proportion of those who see it. The characters all perform their parts acceptably and there is a swing and dash to the story which makes it attractive, despite its suggestiveness and rough vigor. Perhaps it may be said that the men shown have red blood and that always appeals to an audience.

"The Atonement of Thais" (Gaumont).—This supposed Egyptian picture represents the atonement of Thais, who refused to marry. The desert scenery and the fasting required are of interest. The excellence of the mechanical work saves this picture.

"Italian Coast Scenes" (Gaumont).—Like all of Gaumont outdoor pictures this leaves nothing to be desired. The viewpoints selected could not be improved and the resulting pictures are beyond criticism.

"The White Squaw" (Pathe).—It contains thrills enough to last for some time. There are several Indian fights, people are left for dead, but ultimately the Indians are driven away for good. The discovery by the Indians of the little girl whom her father hid in the chest is well managed and there is to the whole picture a rush and whirl which help carry it. It must be admitted that the characterization of the Indian as presented here is reasonably accurate. He is a savage. This picture graphically depicts his savagery.

"Winsor McKay" (Vitagraph).—Here Little Nemo and his his friends are made to do amusing and surprising stunts. Indeed, after watching these pictures for awhile one is almost ready to be lieve that he has been transported to Dreamland along with Nemo and is sharing his remarkable adventures. The film presents something like 4,000 drawings which "Winsor McKay" draws on a bet that he could make moving pictures, and it is an admirable piece of work. It should be popular everywhere. It is one of those films which have a natural advertising heritage in the great and wide popularity of its subject—Little Nemo is known everywhere.

"Bob-Sledding" (Vitagraph).—These exciting scenes were photographed at Huntington, Long Island, where bob-sledding has acquired a national reputation. Every country boy or girl has participated in equally exciting scenes—they know all about it—but to many city people this picture will be a novelty that will attract greatly, just because they don't know all about it, but would like to.

"The Resurrection of John" (Edison).—This is an unusually good comedy. It tells an entertaining story and develops a number of interesting situations. Probably the most amusing scene is where John goes home to be confronted with the arrangements for his own funeral. He is congratulated by the firm upon his escape from death; in fact, his missing the train that was wrecked, saved them much money. Such a comedy always keeps the audience interested and amused and they testified to their appreciation very forcibly where this was seen.

"By a Woman's Wit" (Kalem).—Here we are shown a story of the Civil War in which a spy is assisted by a girl to escape from his prison. The idea of putting a cord in a loaf of bread is the novelty of the play. Aside from that it develops no unusual features. But however that may be, stories of spies are always pleasing to an audience and this one is no exception. The outdoor photography is excellent and there is plenty of life in the action.

"At the Old Mill" (Urban).—This love story is told around a picturesque old mill. Perhaps, for many, the scenery will provide the most attractive feature of the film. The acting is good and there is considerable satisfaction seeing the crusty old landlord relinquish his demand for the girl's hand and bless the two young lovers. But it all has been done many times over and possesses no longer an element of novelty. The scenery is individual, and the photography and the rest of the mechanical processes have been so admirably done that there can be no question of the attractiveness of the picture.

"Making Bamboo Hats in Java" (Urban).—This travelog brings to the audience an industry little known in this country. It is so clearly presented that those who are fortunate enough to see the film can obtain a fair impression of the different processes which enter into the manufacture of these hats. The photography is admirable and the resulting picture is quite as clear as those usually released by this house.

"The Trading Stamp Mania" (Pathe).—This exagerrated story tells what occurred to an unfortunate man whose wife had the trading stamp craze. After a wide variety of moving incidents by flood and field she is apparently convinced that collecting trading stamps is not altogether profitable. Accordingly it is intimated that she desist from further activities in this direction. Women laughed at the pictures of the man getting his own dinner.

"The Chief's Daughter" (Biograph).—We have here a story of Indian vengeance that is different. A prospector makes love to an Indian chief's daughter, but deserts her when his white sweetheart arrives. The Indian girl's vengeance comes when she shows up his perfidy to his white sweetheart and he loses both. Then the Indian women proceed to drive him out of the country. The worst punishment for a man according to Indian ideas is to be defeated or driven away by a woman, and this idea is well carried out in this film.

Opportunity and the Man" (Lubin).—This film presents a graphic presentation of what the fates may do for us. One man falls from his high estate, and, becoming a common burglar, is taken away by the police. The other, a derelict, presented with a chance $5 bill, makes it the basis of fame and fortune and ultimately marries the former wealthy man's sweetheart and buys his palatial house. Putting the men thus in conjunction emphasizes the difference in human characteristics, but the situations are by no means exaggerated. The same things are going on in the great workaday world all the time. The interest is so strongly human that there can be no question of its success with the audiences.

"The Justice of Claudius" (Pathe).—Supposed to be an episode in the life of Messaline, Empress of Rome. Faithfully the picture presents the imperious woman attempting to win the love of Manus, and because she cannot, ordering him to prison and then to execution. Claudius appears opportunely and stays the executioner. Messaline is condemned by the incensed husband, Claudius, to the same death she had decreed for Manus.

As representative of Roman life the film has some interest, but the episode selected is not particularly strong or pleasant. Nor is the tinting in this film very effective, save in one scene.

"Indian Army Exercises" (Pathe).—This is an exhibition of the military "setting-up" drills of the native soldiers of India. They are shown swinging dumbells, on the parallel bars, etc. The claim is made that the Indian regiments are among the best drilled of England's soldiers and this picture will go far to strengthen that belief.

"The Cowboy and the Shrew" (Selig).—A humorous picture, representing the difficulties which beset the marital desires of a cowboy. Ultimately, however, he succeeded in forcing a manifestation of love from the young woman and presumably peace reigned endlessly in the prairie home.

"The Strike at the Mines" (Edison).—This is a melo-dramatic picture, but the bravery of the manager in saving Sanders from the mine fire; and Sanders' bravery in defending the manager from the strikers, together with a few thrilling incidents scattered through the play, keep the interest of the audience at the highest tension. At the denouement, when the strike ends, with the contented men driving away the malcontents, and with Sanders' promotion to the position of assistant manager, the thrill is sent over in fine shape. Even though such things scarcely ever occur in real life there is an exhileration about this picture which cannot be denied. It is the romance of the thing that attracts and pleases; the suggestion, perhaps, that men can, after all, rise superior to circumstances and conquer even the most adverse fate in their struggle for success. The Edison players do this sort of work remarkably well and develop all the possibilities such an incident may possess.

INDEPENDENT.

"Oh, You Suffragette" (American).—This comedy shows how the suffrage germ interfered with family affairs until some brilliant genius conceived the idea of introducing a few mice into the room. The result is magical. High ideas and high ideals vanish in a trice and the women go home to their husbands, where one, at least, effects a re-organization of his establishment upon lines while leave out all consideration of the suffrage cause.

"A Cure for, Laziness" (American).—This lively comedy presents a bargain-counter rush which works a cure for a malady which had baffled the doctors. The man is overjoyed to find his wife so well, but he gets a bad attack himself when he receives the bill for his part in the transaction and immediately takes to his bed.

"A Strike in the Make-Young Business" (Eclair).—This good comedy presents Oldsport undergoing treatment to have his youth restored. A strike occurs in the establishment and the machinery is reversed; there is a sad awakening. It is funny, though, because the work is done by good actors.

"Mr. Nearsight's Marriage" (Eclair).—The difficulties which surrounded Mr. Nearsight when he attempted to propose to one girl and really asked another, afford a reason for immoderate laughter. But the girl he wanted didn't want him and she adroitly managed it so the other gets him after all.

"The Lover's Signal" (Imp).—This film gives the story of a young woman whose reason flies when she supposes her lover killed in an acident. He returns and restores her lost faculties by whistling in a peculiar way that he was accustomed to use for a lover's signal. While the picture has no particular strength, it is well managed and holds the attention of the audience through its suggestiveness. The mechanical work is well done.

"Secret of the Opal Mine" (Yankee).—This story thrills; it shows a blast which kills one man and imprisons another. Then come the frantic efforts of the rescuing party, successful by a hair's breadth. The blast threw down huge quantities of valuable stone and everything runs smoothly for all concerned afterward. There is a pretty love tale included and the human side is worked out with skill.

"The Heiress" (Rex).—No matter how many times a story of this character may be told it always seems to interest. The Rex actors have told it well in this instance, and the mechanical department has assisted with a good series of photographs. For a well known heiress to give out fake information that her beauty or fortune has disappeared is common in stories. But to make it doubly strong and say that both good looks and money are gone is working it pretty hard. However, the poor man of the three suitors, the only one of them who might have been expected to want gold, responds nobly and gets the woman, her good looks unspoiled and her bank roll intact. Such stories are not dramatic. But there is a human touch about them that is always interesting and an audience will watch such a picture and possibly applaud it, when one with strong dramatic situations will be received in silence.

"The Maze of Fate" (Imp).—This story of drunkenness, murder, unjust accusation and various other somewhat exciting events shows a girl as the one who suffers principally and her fate is indeed hard. After being through all the distress depicted in the earlier portions of the film, fate follows her to the last and her lover dies in her arms after the villain, because he helped to convict a murderer, throws him into the river, bound to a log. The impression this film makes is not pleasant. There is a feeling of horror after seeing it, which lingers long. It is all gloom and disappointment and sorrow. The operator of the printer or both ought to be more careful of the mechanical work. The tones are not well maintained. And this poor mechanical work caught is made all the more important by the fact that the acting of the Imp pictures is above the ordinary and most of them tell good stories.

"Reddy's Redemption" (American).—We have in this film the story of the redemption of a famous crook. It is well told and a good deal of interest develops in the crook himself as the picture runs. The photography is clear, while the acting of the story is even and in sympathy with the subject. The audience clearly liked it and made it manifest at the close.

"Oh, You Mother-in-Law" (Powers).—This comedy is based upon the time honored joke which everybody knows so well. Hubby is a good one and accepts a friend's advice to give mother-in-law a good time in order to arouse wifey's jealousy. A summons, fake or otherwise, calls mother home and both parties somewhat effusively help her get ready to depart. This method has been worked out on the screen before, but the vim put into this rendition makes it appear new.

"Touring Athena" (Powers).—This company has been releasing a few travelogs recently and with marked success. This one affords a good view of some of the most famous points of interest in this old city and is so well done that in the end the spectator seems actually to have visited the places shown. The operator selected his viewpoints with care and the mechanical work which followed was carefully done. The views of the ancient buildings, gates and ruins are all satisfactory reproductions. An audience clearly demonstrates its approval of pictures of this type and sometimes it seems strange that more of them are not presented. The number is much less than the excellent opportunities for making them would seem to warrant. The Powers people are to be congratulated upon their good work thus far.

"Charity of the Poor" (Thanhouser).—A rather pathetic picture; this film shows how a mother pined for a child which her rich father selfishly took from her. The little one had its own share of vicissitudes, but happily was found by a poor man and taken to his own home and cared for. Later, when the mother became sick, the child was found by others of the wealthy grandfather. The poor man and his wife were rewarded, and the mother recovered under the influence of the little one. While the picture has little dramatic interest it tells a heart story that is interesting.

"The Price He Paid" (Champion).—This is a story of a woman with a drunken, worthless brute for a husband and of her flight and subsequent employment to a Western town, to which he follows. Troubles multiply for the woman after his arrival, but eventually he dies while hidden in a wardrobe from a sheriff's posse. The sheriff marries the woman and life begins anew for her. The story is dramatic in its appeal to the emotions, which the audience seemed to feel strongly, though it does not give us glimpses of many pleasant things. When, however, the tragic is the straight line of suggestion is that the woman will enjoy some need of happiness in the future.

"The Stolen Necklace" (Nestor).—The film shows a maid unjustly suspected of a robbery and tells how the guilty person was eventually discovered. The various complications are very interesting, though perhaps the action of the girl in tracing the robbery to her father is unusual. But if the situations thus developed are accepted as an essential part of the story the picture loses nothing because of it and the extrication of the maid from an extremely trying position is accomplished without too violent a stretch of the probabilities. The photography is of the Nestorian quality, which is always striking.

"Till Death Do Us Part" (Reliance).—Whether this film is liked or not its strength cannot be questioned. It affords Miss Leonard an opportunity to do some highly emotional acting, which she accepts and develops with unusual success, even for her. The story of thieves is well told and there are numerous moments when the eyes become moist under the influence of the woman's pleas. And there will be admiration for her also when it is shown she prefers with her husband, no matter what he may be, even till "death do us part."

"Bill's Little Plan" (Lux).—We have on this reel a humorous story of how Bill arranged to be near his sudden sweetheart, the colonel's pale, but was discovered and thrown out unceremoniously. His adventures afterwards ending with a good pummelling, are quite as amusing as the opening scenes.

"A Desperado" (Lux).—There is little and there is enough to say about the lives of western literature. There are at least four killings before the story ends and then the bandit who shot it all at the sight of a fifty gas. escape his pursuers ignominiously tossed by an Indian and gets merited punishment. The thrills that accompany the picture cannot be denied, but there has not been so much willing to see him in a long time. The film is marred by tinting.

"Rose of the Circus" (Solax).—This is a pathetic story. A girl was compelled to act in a circus, after an accident to the darling of her own heart. The acting must find another sweetheart, however, and the impression of the story to making him leave this other girl is not pleasant. It would have been an improvement to have allowed the young lawyer to fall in love with the circus girl before he had other unpleasant obligations. This may be a hypercritical suggestion, but the fact remains that these stories which leave one woman or one man to mourn the loss of lover or sweetheart are not altogether pleasant. Sometimes the story makes this necessary, but this one would not be marred by changing it so that no sweetheart is bereft, while the unfortunate circus girl could be made happy, as she is now.

"The Gloved Hand" (Reliance).—This is an interesting story denouement based upon a clever scheme of a detective. He obtains incriminating evidence by comparing finger prints on a paraffined glove with the prints on the box from which the bonds were stolen. The story is new and this, with the detective's bright idea, makes it unusually interesting. This method he used might not always work, but a handshake is such a simple matter that even should it fail none would be the wiser. The love story, with the Mexican's scheme of blackmail are merely the necessary accessories. The main point is the detective's plan to secure the evidence against the woman.

"Cupid's Pocketbook" (American).—This cleverly worked out story, explaining how Cupid played a prank on a couple. A pocketbook is lost. There is a very amusing mixup when each of those interested in the lost pocketbook attempts to describe it and fails, the girl because she didn't know it contained any money. The couple are thought to be desperate criminals. The surprise of the officers when they discover them locked in each other's arms is another amusing occurrence. The film presents a delicious bit of comedy in a bright and attractive way.

"Do Not Judge Rashly" (Eclair).—This is a story of how a man unjustly suspected his wife when shown some writing on a piece of blotting paper. She was tempted, but was strong enough to resist the temptation, as a letter he afterward found proved. His apologies were naturally profuse, but were no more so than he should have given under the circumstances.

"A Good Cigar" (Imp).—This is a story of a man who was given a loaded cigar. He turns the tables upon the jokers by allowing it to roll under their table, where it explodes; it disfigured them seriously.

"A Faithless Man" (Imp).—This incident is clearly told, but it lacks strength. It isn't even an entertaining story, but a record of love and jealousy among desperados and barmaids, with a sheriff as an accessory. The criminal is eventually brought to justice, but only because he proves recreant to his betrothed. That is the redeeming feature of the piece.

"An Adventure in Sicily" (Yankee).—Here is a romance which clings continuously to the brigands of Italy and when one or more is indicted, as in this instance, it adds piquancy to the narrative. There is, however, a rather brutal kidnapping of a girl which is scarcely necessary. The denouement is interesting. The old story of the impecunious nobleman whose estates are heavily mortgaged never loses its interest. And here is a banker ready to take the daughter, and release the mortgage. An American appears, though, and it is all off with the Italian. The idea of having an English marksman pick off the brigands one by one relieves this film from the possible danger of monotony, for it is like others we have seen. When the Englishman appears and clears up the mystery the last tangle is made straight. The scenery is good and the sulphur mines shown will undoubtedly be new to most who will see this film.

"A Midnight Adventure" (Nestor).—Mistaken identity is the pivot of this story. A baby girl comes upon a midnight intruder, whose slouch hat and general rough appearance lead her to believe him to be her uncle from the West. The burglar, a genial, likable fellow, gets very chummy with the tiny girl, and when he deposits all his loose change in her little bank, she rejoices for having the dearest uncle in the world. Here a succession of interesting incidents keeps the audience in good humor. When the real uncle finally arrives, he is held up and handed over to the police, who have been summoned by 'phone. But the girl's father returns home in the nick of time and clears away the situation. The burglar clears out. Six-year-old Florence Conrad, a finsome little tot, bids fair to outrival the older Florences, Miss Turner and Miss Lawrence. Willis Robards, as the burglar, shows some power of characterization.

"Vindicated" (Thanhouser).—This film tells the story of a convict who proved his honesty very unexpectedly, considering the circumstances, and thereby won the love of a minister's daughter. Because he was hounded by his past they are shown leaving for a country where he and his past are alike unknown. The story undoubtedly presents a certain phase of misfortune very accurately and shows one way in which unfortunates may escape persecution.

"The Girl Stowaway's Heroism" (Yankee).—This sea story, presents the adventures of a girl who traveled as a stowaway disguised in her brother's clothes. It has some thrilling passages, and the love story between the girl and the mate of the ship develops in a natural way.

"The Maid's Revenge" (Solax).—This film tells an amusing story, and develops a situation which is often enough talked about. A kitchen maid to get even with her mistress excites her jealousy, but when, however, the angry wife throws down the screen and discovers her husband dictating to his male (not female) stenographer, the situation assumes a comical aspect. The picture closes with everybody looking upon the story and the woman's agitation as a joke. What the maid got for her part in the embarrassing affair is not reported.

"Rickshaw, the Detective" (Reliance).—A comedy presenting a detetive successful in capturing, alone and unaided, desperadoes by the half dozen. He has to accept meekly, however, the dictation of his wife. She strips him of his star, replaces it with a gingham apron and sets him to doing housework. The absurdity of the situation thus created is the basis of the humor.

"Summer Widows" (Reliance).—A bright comedy, it presents the adventures of a young man at a resort where there are numerous girls, but no other man. Ultimately, however, he falls from favor and departs with each one trying to assume a more icy stare than the others.

"A Confidence Trick" (Great Britain).—This detective story will please any audience. Some of the complications in it are more than ordinarily interesting and will keep the people guessing until the denouement. The photography is clear and the acting is excellent. There are a number of thrills introduced which help in maintaining the interesting features at a high standard.

A KICK AND A QUESTION.

April 11, 1911, Newcastle, Pa.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I wrote you some time ago in regard to Reliance and Bison films, jumping and running out of the frame, but my letter is still unpublished. There have been many letters published since you received my first letter, and I trust you will print this one. As I am a paid subscriber to your paper, I think I am entitled to a little space in the World, the same as your other subscribers are. I would also like to know, in your next issue, what has been done with the Pennsylvania aisle question. As far as I can judge, every theater in this city is doing good business at present. I will also say that Independent films have put my business up to top notch, with the exception of Bison and Reliance films. So I would advise these companies to be a little more careful with their work.

Trusting you will publish this letter in your next issue, I am,

Yours very truly,

Fred T. Brown,
Mgr. Royal Theater.

(Your complaint was referred to the manufacturers in question. We have not as yet received any official word as to the settlement of the aisle problems in Pennsylvania.—Ed. Moving Picture World.)

He carries a small Bible with him and from this instructs the Indian girl, his rescuer, in things pertaining to the true God and His commandments. The most impressive of the commandments to the girl is, "Thou shalt not kill." At this time Beardsley, who has been captured by the Indians, is brought into camp and the sight of his treacherous friend awakens memory in the minister's mind. He is obsessed with a desire for revenge and to kill Beardsley himself. WEIGHED IN THE BALANCE.—To carry out his experiments with high explosives, an old chemist spends all his money and finally mortgages his home, his sole remaining asset. The chemist, like most scientists of ability, is a poor business man, and when his debt falls due, is unable to meet it. His creditor, a hard-headed banker, refuses any extension of time, and the scientist decides to seek the refuge of the weak, suicide.

He plans to blow himself up with a bomb he has constructed, and hopes that his fate will be regarded as an accident. Fortunately for him, his daughter, the widower's only child, discovers his plan in time to save him, and to excuse himself in her eyes, he tearfully tells her of his troubles.

The girl decides to make another appeal to the creditor, and once upon him, accompanied by her father. He offers them aid, but the condition horrifies the girl, for help will be accorded the father only on condition that the daughter marry the creditor.

The girl is engaged to the man of her choice. She must either break his heart, she thinks, or condemn her father to death—for she knows he will not survive if separated from the beloved observatory. She chooses, and agrees to marry a man she hates.

On the wedding day, the rejected suitor makes his appearance unannounced. He confronts the bride, who is in her wedding dress, and on her way to the altar. He shows her a revolver, and tells her that when the minister pronounces her the bride of the other man, the first shot she hears ends his life will mingle with the congratulations of her wedding guests.

The girl tears the revolver from his grasp. He then tells her that in her father's laboratory he will find other means of death, and that it is appropriate that her family should supply the weapon that ends the life of the man they have ruined. Then he dashes out.

In her wedding dress, the bride-to-be, follows. By this time she is half crazed herself. They meet in the laboratory, and she brings forward the bomb that her father has constructed. She tells the young man that as they cannot live together they will die together, lights the fuse and awaits the end.

But the suitor is one of those men who is more interested in the theory of suicide than in the method of it. His course fails as his courage has marked by the burning fuse, creeping slowly toward him. In a panic he runs away, leaving the girl to die alone. She is so weak and faint that she could not follow if she would.

The rejected suitor, while running away, meets the bridegroom. He babbles out the story, and tells him that the girl's death is only a matter of minutes. The other man is not deceived by this, he runs into the laboratory, and throws the bomb from the window in the nick of time.

The girl now has a chance to compare her two suitors. She sees that the man she thought she needed is a weak, pitiful creature, unworthy of any good woman's respect, while the man she scorned has the strong, manly traits that compel admiration. He offers her freedom, but she will not want it. She tells him that love has come into her heart, unexpectedly, and joyfully they go to the altar.

DR. GRANT'S WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.—Dr. Grant, a famous medical specialist, has discovered the secrets of a vaccine, and an announcement is made in the papers that he will demonstrate and exploit the discovery the next day before a meeting of scientists. Naturally this announcement arouses considerable interest among the medical fraternity, but particularly in another specialist, Dr. Lambert, who has no less than a personal interesting in the same direction. Intent upon finding out more about this wonderful discovery, he visits the house of Dr. Grant and has an interview with him. He is so overcome by a desire to possess the secret that he bribes Dr. Grant's valet to procure the papers relating to the discovery. Taking farewell of the fortunate specialist, Dr. Lambert leaves. At night the valet steals the papers and hands them through a window to Dr. Lambert, who is waiting there, and then disappears. Next morning the doctor rings for his valet, but of course receives no response, and then proceeds to get the papers together himself—he papers which are to bring him fame. But that fame is never to be his for the discovery that they have been stolen proves far great a shock and Dr. Grant becomes insane. Meantime the scientists are awaiting the arrival of the discoverer, and Dr. Lambert is preparing to present himself and claim the reward of his hitherto gain. At this moment, however, a message arrives announcing that his little daughter is seriously ill. He rushes to his home and to him there only the child of the celebrated Dr. Grant can save his child. Hastily he telephones for the Doctor. We are shown how the demented Dr. Grant receives the message. Some instinct or glimmering of reason in the madman's brain tells him that here lies a chance for his revenge, and he hastens to his rival's house. He orders all out of the room, and only the mother of the child remains. Clasping a knife in his hand the Doctor then advances upon his defenceless victim. But the mother flings herself between them. At first she pleads, then she threatens, but finally the maternal instinct over powers her and she struggles valiantly. The sound of the struggle causes Dr. Lambert to rush in. Then he sees what a dreadful wreck he has created and he goes quietly away. Returning later with the papers, he restores them to their rightful owner, who returns to reason at the sight of his beloved treasures.

RELIANCE.

THIRTY MINUTES.—Jack, in a theatrical boarding house, is visited by an elderly uncle whom he has not seen for many years. To create a good impression he makes up as a minister and acts the part. The other actors in the house enter into the game, and they have much fun at the expense of uncle. Finally, however, the old gentleman breaks into the apartments above, where Jack's racket is going on, and surprises Jack in the midst of a hilarious crowd. Uncle turns out to be a good fellow, and is received with open arms by the good-natured show people.

HER MOTHER'S LOVE.—Howard courtland and Isabel Bowling once betrothed, are separated, and the one marries another man. Courtland removes true to his last love, devotes himself assiduously to business and amasses a large fortune. Isabel's husband dies, and she is compelled to support herself and child, Gertrude, by needle work. Twenty years pass and Isabel and Howard have not met again. Howard orders some fancy shirts from a haberdasher, who gives the work to Isabel. Gertrude delivers the package and meets Howard, who is struck by her resemblance to the sweetheart of his youth. Gertrude tells him of her mother's poverty and her illness, and Howard sends a physician to her address. Isabel meets with a painful accident, scalding her face with boiling water, and is taken to the hospital. During her absence Howard frequently calls upon Gertrude, falls in love with her and wins her promise to marry him. When Isabel returns home Gertrude tells of her engagement, and takes her mother to meet her fiance at his magnificent mansion. As Howard enters the room Isabel recognizes him and drops her veil. When alone she struggles with her emotions and prays for guidance as to which course to pursue. Should she reveal herself and revive the slumbering love in Howard's heart, or should she vanish from sight and leave Gertrude in her new found happiness. Her mother-love conquers, and she decides upon the latter course. Gertrude tearfully rushes to Howard with the farewell note from her mother, and he convinces her the best way out of her difficulties is to marry him at once. As the minister is speaking the solemn words which makes them one, the mother is seen at the farthest window, passing on from the outside darkness, which has subdued in the drama of life which finishes her daughter's happiness and makes Isabel a homeless wanderer.

COPPER WIT.—Ye see it would never have come about over that if I hadn't put smart enough to meet Mary Ellen where the roundsman could not catch them, and then we could sweet talk revenge. For a long time he waited for the chance, until one day, when he was himself bound for a beerfeast in Patty Breezeway's bakery, he saw his rival go down the social alcoval of him. Now Mc-Guinness is fond, as the saying outside of the yard, for the cup to emerge, the teal is easy for a roundsman.

But what on his way for another kettle of beer. Frank saw him waiting and on his return told the cop about it. Here is where the boys gets some of the brainwork, for he arranges to make his exit in a big basket together with some loaves of fresh bread. In he walked under the waiter, and when the roundsman's eyes look in the bread to believe his eyes and to have gets away outside of the yard. Wyoming.

And so it comes to pass that Mulvaney thinks he sees the cop's ghost where Clancy marks telegraphs with his hand and the waiter can't tell which eyes today just how that piece of an ordinary cop ever got out of the saloon and Mulvaney has been there often enough to know every nail. You can bet.

THE WINE HARVEST.—We show here how the peasants of southern France vintage the castle wine from the grapes that grow around their picturesque mountain towers, and how they go on their travels all the possessions that help bring its bewitching taste to our waiting palates and ample purses.

THE LAST ROSE.—When the favorite flower girl of Tommy Atkins in Ireland is in danger of being captured by a visiting American captain all the strategic art of war is called in by the quartet of English soldiers who have long since set their hearts on making the conquest.

Captain Lawrence, dashing and handsome, sends her a note asking for the last rose and little Molly Shannon's parents and their affected airs agree that she ought to. So she does, and with her own dainty hands brings him the last rose of summer.

The Englishmen soon enough learn of Captain Lawrence's victory, and are quick to hatch the most diabolical plot ever dreamt of, to monopolize her attention, if even for a time. It's a real military maneuver, and they succeed. But that never figured on making love and before they can restore it the American has not only turned all their efforts to naught, but by a clever movement has caught all four of them off their guard and has out-flanked, out-generaled and out maneuvered them.

Disgruntled, disheartened, but still severely lovestruck, the "King's finest" must march off the scene in confusion, making room for the spirit of Uncle Sam, which has so completely enveloped little Molly Shannon.

BISON.

AN INDIAN'S MISTAKE.—Hostile Indians are defeated by the cowboys, and Golden Fawn, daughter of the chief, is left for dead. Little Eagle, a Carlisle graduate who aided the whites, finds the girl, revives her and nurses her back to health. Their love is mutual and they are wed, and in course of time the union is blessed by a child. Kitty, a white girl, tries to amuse herself by flirting with the handsome Indian, and Golden Fawn, intensely jealous, leaves him and returns to her tribe, which refuses to accept her. In despair she is about to leap over a cliff when her husband, who has followed her, forces her father to tell him her whereabouts after a desperate fight, and rushes to her side. The explanation fills her with joy, and they once more resume the happy life which was so rudely interrupted.

A MAN OF HONOR.—His fortune swept away, and spurned by Helen, his betrothed, Dick turns to the mining camps of the West. He loses in the wilderness and facing death by starvation, he is rescued by Ogallala, an Indian maid, who takes him to her village, where he is permitted to remain till his strength is restored. His gratitude turns to love, and he marries the maid. Five years elapse, and he is living happily, the father of a handsome boy. He receives word one day that an uncle has died, leaving him a fortune, and that his lawyer is coming to get his signature to certain papers. Helen accompanies the attorney and pleads with Dick to renounce his Indian wife and child and marry her, and a dramatic scene ensues as Dick withstands the temptation, sending Helen back and remaining loyal to Ogallala, who, fearing the outcome, is weeping bitterly in the forest with her child. Dick takes the child in his arms and her tears vanish as he tells her he will be loyal to her forever.

When the thief shows up to present his supposed betrothed with the stolen necklace he is captured after strenuous and amusing efforts to escape.

CHAMPION.

GEN. MEADE'S FIGHTING DAYS.—Virginia Wilson, just before the opening days of "61" was sought after by William Hastings and Frederick Foster, both Southern gentlemen. The storm of war broke out. Sumter had been fired upon. It was then that Virginia discovered into whose keeping she would give her hand. White her whole soul was with her native South, she gave her love to Frederick Foster, whose sympathies were with the Union.

William Hastings, the rejected suitor, threw his lot with the Confederate Hats. Each day the tide of battle ebbed and flowed over the Blue and the crest of the wave, and again the Gray. And, one day a party of Federal soldiers, sorely pressed, sought refuge in a house on the hill—the house was the home of Frederick Foster and his wife, Virginia. In a moment the Jubilee Rebs surrounded the premises and carnage reigned supreme. However, superiority of numbers won out, and the barricades gave way before the fierce onslaught of the Grays. Young Foster was captured and taken away.

Mid the hail of steel and bullets, for the battle of Frazier's Farm was raging in all its fury, somewhere in the midst of that torrent of iron and fire the brave Gen. Meade was directing his gallant Pennsylvania boys.

Braving death from exposure to the shrieking messengers of death flying over the field of battle, Virginia reached the General's tent, and as she desperately pleaded, she mentally reminded him of his own mother, awaiting his probable return home, and his big, stern heart yielded to her womanly appeal.

A detachment of Blues was quickly assigned to the task of rescuing the civilian Unionist and arriving on the scene, they rapidly dispersed the Grays. Clasped in a deep embrace, the reunited pair vow to ever cherish the name of that stalwart leader, Gen. Meade.

SHE WANTED A MAN WITH BRAINS.—A new school teacher was to make her home at Rancher Smith's house, so all the cowboys gathered about the veranda to greet her. She arrived in due time, but gave them a cold look of appreciation and passed into the house. Then the boys turned away with the exception of Thornby, who fell in love with her at first sight. He did several favors for her and even saved her from her unmanageable horse. This so enthralled him that he proposed to her. But he was frigidity "turned down," as she wanted a man with brains.

Thornby then left the ranch and soon found a position in a lawyer's office. He studied so hard that he was soon made a member of the firm and incidentally marrying the associate's daughter.

Thornby was successful in winning the suit for the Smiths, and when he called one day about matters, he met the frigid school teacher, who, after being apprehended of Thornby's uprise, made all endeavors to win him as her husband. But he soon introduced his wife to her, whereupon the Smiths drank to the "Man With Brains."

Roger follows her to the new world, but upon landing in New England is captured by Indians and Hester waits for him in vain. There has never been much love in their marriage. Roger being an old man and she a comely young woman.

Rev. Arthur Dimmesdale, the handsome young minister of the Salem community, is revered and beloved by his parishioners. He meets Hester clandestinely and an unlawful love is the result.

demned to stand upon the public pillory with her child and for the remainder of her life to wear conspicuously on her breast the letter "A."

As she stands on the raised platform, the governor of the colony commands her to divulge the name of the father of the child. She refuses. The Rev. Master Dimmesdale is asked to persuade her to reveal her secret. He addresses her, and tells her if she thinks it for the best, to do so. She again refuses.

Roger, her husband, has been released by the red men and he appears in Salem on the day of her public disgrace and recognizes her. He signals for her to be silent as the recognition is mutual. A silence for a silence is agreed upon. He takes the name of Roger Chillingworth and, being a physician, is called to prescribe for the suffering minister, knowing him to be the father of Hester's child.

The child, Pearl, grows into a beautiful girl and the governor decides that Hester is not the proper person to rear her. Hester in her grief, appeals to the minister and he in turn prevails on the governor to allow her the custody of the child.

As time passes the minister is growing weaker and weaker in bodily strength and the guilty secret gives him no peace of mind. Meeting Hester and Little Pearl by accident, he tells the woman of his terrible punishment. She, in love and pity, tears the letter from her breast and proposes that they leave the country together to begin life anew. Little Pearl finds the letter and hands it to Hester and they realize they cannot escape the consequences of their sinning.

On a sudden the minister preaches a powerful sermon in the church on the sins of the flesh and the penalty for doing, as he says, he has done the darker place, is he cheered by the members of his congregation. He is overcome by emotion as the awful truth is brought home to him that he is a hypocrite. Seeing Hester and Little Pearl standing near, he pulls himself together by a mighty effort and tears to confess his sins publicly.

Taking them by the hands he slowly and deliberately mounts the platform. Hester is amazed, and then, to the astonishment of his flock and the lookers standing near, proclaims Pearl as his blood and arranges himself as the culprit. The members of the church are appalled and dumb with astonishment. They cannot comprehend it. Hester realizes through her tears. She can no longer bear the burden of shame alone. The moment has arrived when she is partially vindicated by the self-sacrificing of the sinner of her degradation.

The final effort, coupled with years of intense suffering, proves too dread a tax on the strength of the minister and he falls dead at the feet of the pillory. Hester supports his head, with tears streaming down her cheeks. The vindication has come, but with it has gone the man she has loved in a second while being subjected to the jeers of her fellows.

WHILE THERE'S LIFE THERE'S HOPE.—Ethel Millie wanted to be garden adjoining her home when her lover, Alfred King, called. She has just finished a letter she has written which she gives him to take to the garden in company with another young man.

The letter is a cruel one, informing King of the engagement that has existed between them, but terminated on account of King's poverty. The same shifts to the office of Samuel Morton, an aged broker, who is desperate on account of financial reverses. He enters a room in a hotel and writes a farewell letter to his friends. King now decides to take his own life and engages apartments in the same dwelling and writes a note to Ethel Morton proclaiming a revolver in himself and King receives on the poison route. King overhears the battle of Ethel's father and hears the noise and seeks another mode of shooting.

In turn King and Morton repair to a high bridge and are about to jump over when a fight appears and frustrates their plans. She comes to Morton with a teddy bear and he leads her away, leaving the bear on the wall. King appears and is about to throw himself over when the child returns for the doll and her mother joins her. King sees his nerve and follows them.

Morton returns to his room and takes out his revolver. King enters the adjoining room, moves his bag and coat and then turns on the gas. He falls from his chair overcome by the fumes of the gas, just as Morton is about to shoot himself. Morton hears the noise and goes into the room of King and finds the young man into his apartment, drags him to the window and receives him. Morton gives King a bit of advice on hearing his story.

Both agree to begin the battle of life anew and to be brave. They leave the hotel and walk away with the light of new hope shining in their faces their troubles lightened by the recent experiences.

To assure his escape the girl allows herself to be convicted of treason. Captain Smith is detailed to escort her to New York. On the road he offers to desert to the Americans and save her if she will promise to be his wife. Sturdily, well knowing the consequences of her decision, she refuses. Later, the party is attacked and conquered by the Americans under Hamilton, who at first totally misconstrues Dorothy's presence, but who soon learns the truth. Dorothy is taken to the American camp and Washington himself gives away the bride, when she and Hamilton are married.

THE RIVAL ARTISTS.—Just how Dudley Warwick had achieved his reputation, his fellow artists were at a loss to understand, for Bruce Webster it was quite the opposite. The few who really knew unanimously declared his work to be that of a genius. However, should his picture of Judge Wilson's daughter Millie, meet with approval, his recognition would be assured.

Judge Wilson, after seeing the finished portrait, agreed with Millie that it is superb. However, Artist Warwick, suffering from jealousy, sent another on oil painting which was generally conceded to be his best. It pleased Judge Wilson, but not his daughter, who decided to have various critics' opinions on the painting. In the meantime, Millie hurried to Bruce's studio and proceeded to substitute a painting of his in place of Warwick's.

In due time the critics arrived, and greatly to the satisfaction of Bruce and Millie and to the intense astonishment of Judge Wilson, declared that never before had they realized the really great genius of their friend Warwick like the names had been painted out. There were unanimous in pronouncing the latter work perfection and the defects as Dudley Warwick appeared humanity they appealed to him to uphold their opinion, and he turned to cast a supreme glance at the condemned landscape, but stopped in amazement. It was his painting! Then they saw Millie and realized in this manner. In vain did his friends attempt to excuse their blunder—the great Warwick rushed angrily from the house. Judge Wilson, as he came forward to congratulate his future son-in-law, expressing his opinion of them in no uncertain manner.

HERODIAS.—Herodias, wife of Herod, the Jewish ruler, is deeply incensed by the great and pious Prophet, John the Baptist for his condemnation of her incestuous marriage to Herod, and causes him to be imprisoned. Herodias' daughter, Salome, by her dancing, pleases Herod so much that he promises her anything she wishes, even to the half of his kingdom. Salome, at the instigation of her mother, asks for the head of John the Baptist. Herod, who has been deeply impressed by the prophet's teachings, is loath to grant the request, but, fearful of losing face before his guests, he finally consents. Salome receives the head of John the Baptist on a platter and presents it to her mother. Herodias, in her hatred, spits upon the head and stabs it with a dagger. Herod, horrified at the deed, orders the execution of Herodias.

Salome, after viewing the head of John the Baptist, decides to put down her earrings to dance before the Prophet's head. She does so, and as she dances Herod becomes fascinated by her charms and desires of her. Salome, however, is not to be won by Herod, and at last Herodias presents upon the Tribune to the head of the Prophet.

Shortly afterwards Herod and Salome are married. Salome has been warned by Herodias that Herod is a man of many intrigues, and that he has had Herodias' former husband murdered by the same method as that employed by Herodias in the case of the Prophet. Salome, however, is not to be won by Herod, and at last Herodias presents upon the Tribune to the head of the Prophet.

couples with his request. After appeasing his thirst, he turns to throw a few open bills on the table and, covering her sobbing at the humiliation. The bandit gets a clue to the Mexicans' exit by the old beef prop of his horse. He comes upon the Mexicans, who is engaged in a game of cards. The trapper lies words with the Mexican, and in the struggle which follows the gun held by the Mexican is discharged and the Mexican falls. The Sheriff shuts to get his man but meets with an accident on the way.

Mary is on her way with food to her fugitive husband, when she finds the sheriff pacing with a broken arm. She assists him to her home. When the sheriff is well on his way he discovers the dresses that Mary is the wife of the man he is hunting again. The trapper, in the meantime tires of loafing and returns to find the sheriff peering through the window, notes the sheriff putting his wife's hand. The trapper dashes into the cabin with drawn gun. Marie jumps in front of the sheriff to protect him.

After the husband has explained the circumstances of the killing (which was purely accidental), he offers to go with the sheriff, but when he looks at the weeping woman decides that he never did care much for the office of sheriff and bids them both goodbye and leaves them in peace.

THE GIRL OF THE CORAL REEFS.—In the wreck occurs on the "Coral Reefs." By some miraculous chance, a babe was saved by some fishermen. The child, grown to womanhood, is the idol of the plain fisher folk. An American artist spies a beautiful girl pitching shells from the sea. He is struck with her beauty and asks her to pose for him; the girl, frightened at the sight of the stranger, flees to her adopted father for protection. The artist follows and explains to the mother, who calms her daughter's nervous fears, and she consents to pose for the picture.

A young fisherman, in love with the lass, perceives her posing for the artist. He takes a stone upon the scene below, which strikes the artist upon the shoulders unlesing the head. He is carried to the girl's home, where she, with womanly tenderness and in the course of a few weeks is able to prepare for his departure.

He receives a telegram from his mother, who was notified of his accident and she soon arrives from the mainland. The girl sees the locket the lady recognises the locket and narrates the story of the burning ship when she was separated from husband and baby, thinking them dead. Here she has found her child and the artist a new sister.

With regret the girl is given to her mother and they depart for the mainland where we discover the girl is surrounded by all the luxuries she could desire. "The call of the sea" is, however, too strong within her. She is unhappy and knowing nothing but the simple life, she longs to return; unable to restrain her feelings she steals from her new villa home in her fisher girl garb and appears at her humble home happy in the love of the only mother she knew and rejoices in the devotion of the plain fisher boy of the coral reefs.

SOLAX.

THE VOICE OF HIS CONSCIENCE.—Old Squire Mosher, a grasping old soul, sends the village constable to either collect what is due from John Reynolds or serve him with a dispossess notice. The Squire then turns his attention to the breakfast set before him by his pretty daughter, only, however, as is his habit, to find fault with everything. The knife proves to be the last straw and after upbraiding the daughter, the Squire goes outside to sharpen the knife, leaving her weeping at the table.

Her lover, Harry, comes along and finds her in tears and tries to soothe her. She tells him to returns and angrily orders Harry from the house. Harry replies in like manner and a quarrel ensues, after which Harry decides to next see the home of John Reynolds, whose wife is ill in bed. The constable sent by the Squire serves John with a notice to vacate. Without reading it John decides that he will appeal to the Squire for leniency, and goes to his house. He arrives just after the scene with Harry and finds the old man worked up and excited. His request is met by insult and finally the Squire, losing all control of his temper, attacks him with a cudgel. John defends himself as best he can, and in the struggle that follows the Squire is killed accidentally by the very knife he had sharpened. Though really guiltless of the crime, John realizes that his story would never be believed if he is found alone with the body, and hearing some one approaching, he hides in a closet in the room.

In the meantime, Harry has been persuaded by Ruth to return and make one more effort to gain the old man's consent to their marriage. He comes into the room just as the old man breathes his last. Surprised, John bends over him and picks up the knife with which the deed was done. He is found in this position by the neighbors and, of course, accused of the crime.

Then follows a series of dramatic situations, leading up to John's final vindication, which are intensely interesting.

LECTURE
THE LIFE OF MOSES

When this standard five-reel subject was issued by the Vitagraph Company a little over a year ago, we printed in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD a descriptive reading for each reel, prepared by the Rev. Madison C. Peters. The demand for copies of the WORLD containing these readings have exhausted our supply, so we have reprinted them in pamphlet form.

This important Biblical series of pictures should never be presented without a lecture, and, to make this possible, we will supply the exhibitor with the complete set at the nominal price of Ten Cents, postage paid.

WE WILL FIGHT

Every Moving Picture Exhibitor or any one else who attempts to use or manufacture one of our "Mirror Screens" which is protected by United States Patent dated Oct. 19, 1909, and Canada Patent dated Jan. 18, 1910.

The United States Court, District of Indiana, in January handed down a sweeping decision declaring our patent valid and adjudicating same.

The Ft. Wayne Art Glass Co. attempted to make a "Mirror Screen" for the Gayety Theatre of Ft. Wayne, Indiana. We brought suit against both and won the suit. The Ft. Wayne Art Glass Co. had to quit business, the Gayety Theatre Co. was enjoined from using the screen and we were awarded judgment against both parties and they had to pay us the cold cash damages and the screen was turned over to us.

THIS IS NO BLUFF. Look up the records of the United States Court if you doubt our word. We will defend our rights to the utmost limit of the law.

We find that two other infringements exist and we will file suit at once. This is a warning to you, and everyone that has any such thoughts.

We will pay $50.00 to anyone who will give us convicting evidence against anyone who may be using or manufacturing one of our screens without license from us.

Ibsen's "Pillars of Society" Here!

THE THANHOUSER WO-A-WEEK

RELEASED TUESDAY, MAY 2

The Pillars of Society

BY HENRIK IBSEN

This is the original "Ibsen Film"—the initial Ibsen play to be put into moving pictures. And many think it the very masterpiece of the great playwright who has just departed. And we, on our part, feel that if he had been spared to see the "first proof" of the film of his play as we saw it the other day in our inspection room, he would have enthused over it every jot as much as did we. WE raved! Undoubtedly, you and your patrons will, too.

No. 207. Code Word, Soci.

RELEASED FRIDAY, MAY 5

A Motion Picture Parable

The Sinner

is positively the strongest and most unique dramatic plot we have evolved this year and we invite your opinion as to whether it isn't THE best you've ever seen. It's a story that we can well be proud of, one that we can well afford to pit against anything of its class on the market. It's a story that carries distinct uplift and goes to firmly fasten the motion film on the high pedestal to which previous Thanhouser and other good issues have raised it.

Solve This Baffling Mystery

"Gen. Filmco is ......"

Get busy and fill in the blank. Maybe you can't do it, but it won't hurt to try. Next week I am going to print the solution of this baffling, deep, weird, uncanny, awful mystery. Take a good look at the back of his head. Then watch for the headline of my advertisement next week. A year ago over 7,000 easy exhibitors were each paying Gen. Flimco $2 a week ($14,000 per week, $728,000 per year). Less than 4,000 exhibitors are doing it NOW. How many will the General have on his staff in another year? Solve this mystery and watch for new facts. Also, come to the biggest, best and hustlingest film renter in the world.

Heinz Boasts of 57—We of Over 500

Yes, Over 500 letters received in the last six weeks proclaim REX, KING OF ALL FILM. Here are a few of them.

If there is an exhibitor who can afford to run a moving picture theater without a REX weekly, let him send in his name and photograph, we would like to see what he looks like.

ST. LOUIS, FEB. 2, 1911.

"I saw your test release today and must say it is the finest Independent picture I have ever seen from a photographic and detail and novelty standpoint and the posters too excel all others. You certainly are to be congratulated upon the good work.

FRANK L. TALBOT,
Mgr., Gem & Lyceum Theatres.

STEELETON, PA., APR. 14, 1911.

"Keep on, you're doing fine."

P. M. NEY, Palace & Ney Theaters.

HUDSON, N. Y., APR. 15, 1911.

"Your stuff is all to the merits and making good in our house, and I am featuring same as much as possible as I find it pays to tell when you have something good."

N. E. WEEKS, Mgr. Warren Theater.

"I am going to ask you to send me all your advance news about Rex pictures. I was present at the Sales Co.'s ball and was much pleased to see your first release. It showed the people that the Independents have added another link to the chain that will soon make the trust wake up. We have been looking in detail while beating them on stories but your Heroine of '76' combines both good acting and photography. I hope you will continue to give us this class of pictures, thereby making it easier for us to get customers."

M. W. LEIGHTON, Park Theatre.

AUSTIN, MINN. MAR. 30, 1911.

"I am writing to congratulate you on your first release. A friend of mine saw it a few days ago. In the past six years I have seen ten first releases of many companies, but can truthfully say that I never saw an opening reel that even remotely compared with your magnificent film. The solid, substantial settings, the fine photography, the costuming, the grand light effects and the tinting of this reel would be beyond doubt of the manufacturers now making pictures."

DON V. DAIGNEAU, Mgr., Bijou Theatre.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., MAR. 30, 1911.

"I have shown all of your releases so far on the second day, and I want to congratulate you on making such fine films. The photography, the acting, the lights, the details, all make your films more natural than any I have so far shown. Your 'Five Hours' was simply great."

H. C. FARLEY, Empire Amusement Co.

BUFFALO, N. Y., MAR. 23, 1911.

"We are showing your weekly releases and want to compliment you on your good photography and acting, and hope to still keep up the good quality of your pictures."

GEM THEATER.

SEDALIA, MO., MAR. 14, 1911.

"Just a few words of congratulation. Today for the first time ran a Rex film, 'By the Light of the Moon,' and it made a big hit with my patrons."

F. J. BAILEY, Electric & Palace Theaters.

PITTSBURG, PA., MAR. 7, 1911.

"We like the Rex films very much as do all our customers. When we can see our way clear to buy more prints we will be glad to do so."

PITTSBURG PHOTOPLAY CO.

PALESTINE, TEXAS, APR. 7, 1911.

"Enclosed is a clipping from the daily paper of this city. It will show you the mights boost we give the Rex pictures and we want to commend you on the excellency of your film. It would have done your heart good to hear the applause which greeted the introduction. That introductory novelty is fine. We will prevail on our Film Co. which is the Dixie of New Orleans, to supply us with all your releases."

E. C. BELL, The Gem Theater.

CAIRO, ILLS., MAR. 25, 1911.

"The Rex films are O. K. and I am sure glad that some of the Independent people can put out a steady picture. Rex makes about the sixth or seventh out of the whole outfit that you don't have to tie on the screen. With best wishes."

T. A. KIMMEL, Bijou Theater.

CHICAGO, ILLS., MAR. 11, 1911.

"All hail to Rex! Saw one of your reels last Thursday and it certainly is a bright star in the film firmament, easy to distinguish its lustre in the constellation. Nothing to it, if you fellows will put out such subjects and photography right along. Quite a large percentage of our many customers are making special requests for the film. Pure merit makes us a booster for Rex."

JOSEPH HOPP, Standard Film Exchange.

SALT LAKE CITY, FEB. 22, 1911.

"Please accept my congratulations on your new 'Rex' film 'A Heroine of '76,' which we held over for today, Washington's Birthday, cannot be excelled—not a flicker in the picture and the story enacted with all attention given to details. The Rex will certainly soon grow to be one of the most popular films."

W. S. RAND, Daniels' Theater.

LA CROSSE, WIS., MAR. 27, 1911.

"As an exhibitor we want to congratulate you on your releases. We have run them all up to 'Five Hours.' I saw 'Five Hours' first run in Milwaukee and it was exceptionally clever. We take our service from the Western Film Exchange and I have a standing order with them for all Rex releases."

H. H. BURFORD, Lyric Theater.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., APR. 4, 1911.

"Rex pictures are positively 'IT' in our theater."

LOUIS SCHICK, Standard Picture Theater.

JERSEY CITY, N. J., APRIL 5, 1911.

M. COOPER, Premium Picture Plays.

TRINIDAD, COLO., MAR. 14, 1911.

"Hurrah for the Rex—It's great."

A. R. WILSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., MAR. 17, 1911.

"We have paid particular attention to your releases and wish to congratulate you upon the excellent photography, acting, and everything in general. It is something that the Independents need among their output. Such an addition as Rex films is certainly a compliment to the Independent output and wish you every success and continuance of same."

CALIFORNIA FILM EXCHANGE.

SAN FRANCISCO CAL., MAR. 7, 1911.

"Allow us to congratulate you on the excellent beginning you have made in the production of motion pictures and at the same time express the hope that your future work will be in keeping with the high standard you have set for yourselves. Your first release 'A Heroine of '76,' was in our estimation well nigh perfect in technical execution and photographically and the two which followed were almost as good. 'By the Light of the Moon' proved to be a welcome relief to the usual thing. We desire to feature your productions. Again congratulating you on the distinct advantage you have brought to the ranks of the Independents, we remain,

A. R. OSBERG, The Flag Theater.

BOSTON, MASS. MAR. 13, 1911.

"Just a word in reference to the quality of your films. We have bought every release since your first release and have found all your films to be perfect in every detail. The demand for your film is getting stronger every day and we have no doubt that if you keep up the good work in your future releases that your films will be classed among the best either of the Independent or the Association. We wish to congratulate you upon the good work and we assure you of our co-operation at all times.

W. ASHER,
Mgr. W. E. Green Film Exchange.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., FEB. 28, 1911.

"We have seen your first release of Thursday, Feb. 16th, 'A Heroine of '76.' We feel that you deserve great praise, and herewith tender our congratulations. Various comments were heard from our patrons on the tinting, photography work, staging, acting and the general good qualities of the film. Hoping you will continue to turn out more of the same good stuff and that great success may be yours, we remain,"

WALTER, D. BURWELL,
Mgr. Hippodrome Theater.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., MAR. 29, 1911.

"We wish to state that our patrons are speaking very highly of the Rex film and we hope that they will continue to do so. We think that it speaks very well for you taking into consideration the length of time your goods have been on the market."

EXHIBITORS' FILM SERVICE CO.

MUSKEGON, MICH., APR. 19, 1911.

"We always feel proud when our patrons come to us after a performance and congratulates us on our show. It gives us courage and makes us feel that our chances for a long prosperous engagement is good. We always appreciate a kind remark, whether it comes from the laborer or the aristocrat, and we are positive that the manufacturer is just as proud of a kind remark from the exhibitor as the exhibitor is of a congratulation from his patron. Therefore, permit us to say that in our estimation, and, according to the many praises from our patrons, you are making the BEST pictures of any company in existence at the present time. Keep up the good work and you certainly will win out. Your photographs are superb, and can be plainly seen that everything is done by artists of the best class. We believe you are in a class by yourself and are setting a pace that no other company has even attempted. You certainly have our support and best wishes."

Public Opinion Controls.

ARTICLE II.

One phase of the evolution of this business, which may be attributed to the formative effect of public opinion, is the tendency to again separate the variety show from the picture show proper. Some managers, through ignorance of what the public really wanted, and others driven to it by competition, have, in the past, endeavored to swell their receipts by interspersing with the pictures cheap vaudeville acts which were inferior to the pictured dramas. They could not afford to pay for acts of merit, therefore the entertainment was made so distasteful that the public revolted. The amusement-seekers who craved for variety hied themselves to the big vaudeville houses; the picture devotee patronized more and more the houses which featured the picture alone.

We were never more enthused over the drawing power of the strictly picture show than at the present moment. A tour of the Chicago shows made during the past weeks revealed a far more healthy state of the business than that of a year ago. Well-filled, often packed houses are the rule and not the exception. Owners are extending their premises or rebuilding larger and better houses. In the residential sections, especially, it was gratifying to note the large proportion of evidently well-to-do people—the class that at one time would have been ashamed to be seen entering a moving picture show. That the attendance was steady was shown by the fact that the managers or doorkeepers greeted or recognized by a nod a large number of their customers. This proves that public-opinion control is introversive in its effect upon the destiny and popularity of the picture.

THE WELL BALANCED PROGRAM.

Another development of the business noted in many theatres is better balance in the programs. In Chicago, especially, the "first-run" fever seems to have had its day. The clamoring for first run at the exchange has ceased. It is not even now considered good business to feature one first run and make up the balance of the program with releases of uncertain date. A program well balanced as to class of subject is not always possible with all first run; the balance of quality is not maintained by a mixture of new and the very old. Consequently the wise and observant exhibitor now selects his program, or instructs his exchange to select it, from week-old or fortnight-old subjects. It is thus easy to arrange a program with a judicious mixture of scenic, dramatic and comic.

EXHIBITORS MORE DISCERNING.

The keener interest of the public in the picture is reflected in the increased attention of the exhibitors to the kind of pictures that elicit most approval from their audiences. When we first began to question the exhibitor on this subject there were few who could tell us the titles or the makers of the reels on the day's program. Now we run across many who can intelligently discuss quality and who not only remember but keep a record of popular reels for future recall. The question put to one exhibitor, "What films released during the past twelve months were, in his opinion, the best?" elicited the following reply:

"The two greatest comedies I recall were 'Percy, the Cowboy' (Lubin) and 'Fruit and Flowers' (Imp). The greatest scenic was Pathe's 'A Trip through Ceylon.' The greatest topical film was Vitagraph's 'King Edward's Funeral.' The greatest educational film was the Urban-Eclipse 'Fly Pest' issued by George Kleine. The greatest historical drama was Pathe's 'Abraham Lincoln's Clemency,' and the greatest drama was Vitagraph's 'By the Faith of a Child.' In my opinion the Vitagraph Company led all others in big productions by their releases 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' and 'The Life of Moses.'"

This is a fairly comprehensive resumé by one exhibitor of the outstanding features of the year, based upon public opinion or the effect noted upon the audiences.

Another exhibitor recalled "The Stranger," produced by the Kalem Company, as being the most impressive picture he had shown, and which he had repeated and would repeat again at the first opportunity. He added that proper music, rendered with pictures of this character, greatly influenced their effect upon the audience. For "The Stranger" he used the complete composition of Tosti's "Good-Bye" at the ending and timed the running of the picture to fit the music, with the result that many of the spectators would be shedding tears at the close of the picture.

A theatre owner-manager, who is also proprietor of a traveling show, informed us that Selig's "County Fair" received the most applause of any picture he had shown. "The Fighting Preacher" (Vitagraph) caused the most talk

He said he ran this film seven days in succession to tremendous business at his airdome. Asked what he considered the most impressive picture he replied, "Of course, the 'Passion Play.' Next to that in its effect upon the audience he placed Edison's "Laddie," which often left the audience in tears.

The obvious deduction from our discussions and observations is that public opinion is not lacking in its approval of the picture that shows thought on the part of the producer. That the element of thought is entirely lacking in some pretentious productions, and that it is the reason why they fail to "go over," we will endeavor to show in future articles.

The Airdome Season.

In the spring a manager's fancy turns to thoughts of open-air. With the cracking of the baseball bats, we are reminded that the summer season is on, and by the time this paper reaches the reader, many exhibitors will be taking their chances with spring weather and have their airdomes running. We expect to see in the airdome the same process of evolution that has already been working great changes with the regular theatre buildings. At first, airdomes began with the ordinary board fences and wooden benches in the roughest kind of way. Last season marked some improvement in the open-air theatre by the appearance of more pretentious plants. The idea of decoration is beginning to make itself manifest, the same as it did with the former crude state of the store show. As yet we have seen nothing extremely elaborate in the architectural or constructive line, as compared with some of the pretentious winter homes of the moving picture. But on the whole, there has been some improvement.

Most of the airdomes we have noticed up to the present time look more like billboards than they do like theatres. It seems to be the fashion to reserve a small section of the enclosure for an entrance and turn the remainder over to the bill-poster and sign-painter, who decorate it in their usual crazy-quilt fashion. Perhaps there are some managers who think that the small amount of revenue to be derived from allowing their enclosures to be used as billboards will more than offset the unsightly appearance of a lot of promiscuous advertising inside and outside. It has been conceded by the exhibitors generally that the use of advertising slides in moving picture theatres is bad taste. We believe that to be the case, because it is forcing patrons to look at something for which they did not pay their money to see. The fence sign of an airdome, whether it be inside or the outside, is not quite so much a nuisance as the advertising slide, but it looks bad, very bad.

We would rather see handsome architectural fronts, with tasty advertising panels for the current programme arranged so as to form a part of a well-balanced whole. A high, clean front, worked out in art-metal or rustic material, is in every way desirable. There is no reason why an airdome should not be the equal, in appearance, of the more permanent theatre, knowing what excellent effects can be obtained with stamped metal. In lieu of metal, one of the prettiest ideas of airdome decoration is the rustic scheme. There have been several extremely pleasing airdome fronts and interiors treated with bark and boughs in a way that is restful and cooling by its very appearance. Rustic decoration was a clever thought as applied to open-air amusement parks. One of them we have in mind was laid out on its front elevation with well-worked panels of bark. All that was not built of bark was painted in a cool green, which harmonized with the brown bark in a way that was very "summery." By way of ornament there were placed about numerous green pines in tubs covered with bark. No bill-posting or sign-painting marred its quiet appearance. It is the only airdome we remember with pleasure every time it comes to mind. Rustic decoration has not been carried out to its fullest extent, as we hope some day it will be. There should be occasional rustic chairs and benches here and there, rustic hanging flower-pots and other little novelties along the same line.

Another great innovation for airdomes that has appeared in the past year is the weather-proof canopy, which is designed to be drawn over the heads of the audience in case of rain. In our issue of October 15, 1910, we devoted a page to the airdome canopy, and at that time called attention of exhibitors to a great saving. The large canopy mentioned paid for itself inside of a week and earned many hundreds of dollars on account of the plant not having to close down on rainy nights. We also pointed out that late in the fall, when other airdomes had closed, the proprietors of the place in question continued a few weeks into cold weather by the addition of a side-wall canvas, which kept out the wind, the enclosure being heated by the warmth of the patrons themselves. We expect to see canopies over every airdome this season. Their value is too great to be ignored. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD was the first paper to call attention to this money-saving device, which was first used, to the best of our knowledge, by the Virginia Amusement Company of Jersey City.

Moving Pictures in the Home.

Some months ago in these pages we printed a special article dealing with family portraits by means of cinematography. It was pointed out at that time that the film record of the family would, in all probability, be the means of establishing the cinematograph in the home in much the same manner as the phonograph underwent its transformation from a piece of business furniture to a household ornament.

There has been an idea prevalent for a number of years that the proper way in which to introduce cinematography as a home amusement would be to serve it up as some sort of a toy. Accordingly, along this line there have appeared and disappeared a number of dinky contraptions that burned the fingers, strained the eyes, tried the temper and warped the patience. These have been marketed under various names as home moving picture machines. It is no secret that they have all been dismal failures and found their ways into the scrap heap, simply because they were toys and not at all practicable. As yet the idea of a genuine professional moving picture projection apparatus as a piece of household furniture is regarded as being out of the question on account of its great initial cost and the cost of maintenance, the high cost of reels, etc., etc. This monetary consideration seems to be the great obstacle that looms between the cinematograph and the home.

A practical projection machine for ordinary purposes today sells at about $200. Commercial reels that are still in very good shape may be had even as low as $1 per day for exhibition purposes, and it is reasonable to suppose that they might be had for less when the film renter knows that they are to be used for private purposes and not subjected to any long grind of twelve hours, but only once through the machine, which would mean little or nothing in the way of wear and tear.

All modern residences are usually wired for electricity, which would mean no financial outlay on that account. There is no outlay required for opera chairs, as there are generally enough chairs and sofas in the ordinary household, including the dining-room and the kitchen chairs, to provide for any family party. Or if not, they can be rented at a very small sum from undertakers, who usually take care of the euchres, weddings and other such affairs.

The principal requirement therefore is the projection machine, as the initial and practically the only investment. To be sure, it might cost a few dollars to give an evening's entertainment, but when one considers what it costs to give a church social at home, the price of a few reels is very insignificant in comparison. If any of our church ladies could be compelled to sit down and figure out the exact cost of some of their afternoon teas, or sewing-circles, or other such affairs, they would be appalled at the cost of them, which is generally, at present, glossed over in some fashion or other.

No doubt if we were to approach the family of the average business man, and endeavor to sell a professional projection machine, they would all gasp at the thought of paying $200 for one of them. But the very next day some piano salesman might possibly call around and convince them that their $200 piano was out of date and make a bargain to take it in exchange for one costing $500, and the family would see nothing inconsistent in the transaction. There are pianos in the homes of nearly every well-to-do family, and it is a safe assertion to say that in half of the homes where there are pianos there is no one in the family who is able to play. Therefore the amusement they get from their pianos is nil, except when some friend or relative, who is able to play, pays them a visit and is finally coaxed to perform. In some of the more fortunate homes there are to be found self-playing pianos, which go a long way towards the amusement of the family, and make up in a great measure any lack of musical training. These, with the cost of music rolls, form a considerable item of expense, and at present are to be regarded in the nature of a luxury. The same applies to the phonograph when music of the better class is desired.

The self-playing piano has become an institution, and the tremendous amount of business that is done by the makers of those instruments is all the testimony that need be offered in support of the statement. To us, therefore, it does not appear that the introduction of the professional projecting machine in the home can be considered as a monumental proposition, nor can we discern any insurmountable barrier on the score of expense, because it compares in that respect very favorably with the untouched piano or the much-used player-piano, to say nothing of the family automobile with its complicated machinery and high cost of maintenance. But aside from our views, the idea prevails that home cinematography is entirely too expensive for consideration, and it remains with the moving picture trade to prove otherwise.

It appears that the moving picture portrait will be the means of bringing cinematography into the home. When one considers the prices asked by photographers not only on Fifth Avenue but on other avenues in other cities for ordinary cabinet photographs or "art panels" or still photographs by any other fancy name, the difference between them and what it would cost for a couple of hundred feet of film is not great. We have in mind an old lady who is wealthy. She sits alone for days and thinks of her beloved husband who was all there was in life for her. When he passed away he left her money, but her life is destitute of its greatest charm, which is love. We had known her in happier days, but now she is changed altogether and scarcely the same person. Recently we put the question to her as to what she would give to have a moving picture of her departed husband, and instantly she straightened up; a fire glowed in her dull eyes as she declared that she would give anything she possessed to have a moving picture of him who had been her life's companion.

We never realize our attachment to our loved ones until it is too late. The moving picture is the only agency that will bring the dead back to life; the only medium that can bring back a smile that is cold in death. In this manner we could go on for hours citing instances of the above nature. There are certain people in the trade who are inclined to pooh-pooh our ideas on this subject. We are told by some of them that an article of this kind will bring a smile of pity from the wise ones. We are willing to assume that risk, and if there is anyone who would like to argue the matter, they will kindly step forward and knock off the chip.

The Film of the Week

The question heard on every hand, "Have you seen 'The Fall of Troy'?" stamps this great spectacular production as the picture of the week. It is to be regretted that the market is not open to the universal exploitation of such a masterpiece of art and human endeavor. Truly, in "The Fall of Troy" the Itala Company of Italy have made a name for themselves and will have to live up to the standard of their own greatness hereafter. The effect upon the public mind as to the perfection of the silent drama will be greatly enhanced by this remarkable picture.

We saw it in the Janet Theatre, Chicago. In the early part of the evening it was impossible to gain admission. A mass of waiting people filled the lobby and extended out into the street. Coming back again at ten o'clock, the condition was unchanged, and it was only after passing in a note to the proprietor, Mr. Hyman, asking him if he intended keeping open all night that he managed to bring us in through a side door.

The projection in the Janet is splendid, and the musicians and drummer, by excellent work, greatly added to the effect. The picture received the applause it deserved, and Mr. Hyman expressed himself as greatly pleased with the increased quality of the Independent product. He announced to his audience that at the end of the week he would show the Great Northern "Hamlet," another feature film, which announcement was also applauded.

For historical productions like "The Fall of Troy," the European manufacturer has it all over the American producer. The old country is, of course, more full of opportunity, and its history is more prolific of incident.

The Exhibitors' League of New York.

That a virile, active and truly representative organization is needed in Greater New York to give intelligent attention to the interests of moving picture exhibitors is so plain that it would seem hardly necessary to point it out. Yet it is reported that, here and there, among exhibitors there are some who are very hard to convince. Probably no business is more in danger of being handicapped and perhaps damaged by well-intentioned but unwise and unnecessary legislation than is the moving picture business. Few understand the conditions under which these little theatres are run or how much good they do. Yet many voices have been raised against them, sometimes by thoughtless and sometimes by self-advertising reformers. These criticisms are heeded by many. None can answer them so authoritatively as an organization truly representative of all the exhibitors in the business.

In another column of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD are printed the by-laws of a new organization, the "Exhibitors' League of Greater New York." A feeling has been growing for some months that a thoroughly representative organization of this kind is needed here, an organization that includes every exhibitor in the Greater City. A number of representative exhibitors called a meeting on March 30th last at The Union Square Hotel, Fourth Avenue and Fifteenth Street. This meeting was well attended and a good deal of enthusiasm was shown for the movement. As a result of that meeting, the Exhibitors' League has been thoroughly organized.

Its present officers are: Will. C. Smith, President; Joseph Lesoll, Vice President; Edw. Sweeney, Treasurer; A. Lardis, Fin. Secretary; Ben. Marks, Serg.-at-Arms. Mr. Ben. Title is the Secretary, and may be addressed at his office, 105 East 14th Street.

The League meets every Thursday at the Union Square Hotel at 1 P. M. Over a hundred were reported present at the last meeting, at which the by-laws were considered and the questions which they brought up discussed. Because, in some instances, so many views were presented, one or two sections were left in a tentative state, for the League is determined to build up the most representative and efficient organization possible.

The paramount purpose of the League is to co-operate with the authorities in a wise regulation of moving picture theatres. It also aims to enlighten the authorities from time to time, as regulations are proposed, just what the actual facts are, so that legislation directing this business may be intelligent.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD takes pleasure in commending this movement. The League is needed by each and every exhibitor in New York. What authority it will have must depend on the attitude of individuals toward it. To show how much good a strong organization can do we can point out what the Theatrical Managers' Association of Providence, R. I., has accomplished. Read the column in this issue headed "New England."

We are publishing in full these by-laws of the New York Exhibitors' League in the hope that they may prove of service to exhibitors in other cities who are considering the need of organizing. These by-laws will be modified as experience shows need. We advise our readers to file them for future reference, as they may be the means of saving time in organizing.

The Theatre of Cinematography.

By ROBERT GRAU.

The conduct of the Eden Musee by its directors for a period now approaching two decades has been with a view to identify that establishment as the "Theatre of Cinematography," where the motion picture and every new phase of progress in the art of cinematography finds its first and always its most adequate expression.

The fact that the admission price here is fifty cents is no reason why there should not be more "theatres of cinematography," and he will be a wise individual who first establishes a precedent for this, by demonstrating that a superior presentation of advanced cinematography will command a slight increase in the admission scale with far more alacrity than a resort to inferior vaudeville.

Already the five-cent theatre is practically obliterated, but the ten-cent theatre where moving pictures alone prevail is a popular institution.

There is nothing to indicate that a high-grade theatre charging prices ranging from ten to twenty-five cents and presenting only moving pictures of the most advanced type, and with appropriate accessories and musical accompaniment, will not revolutionize the field itself. And the writer is firm in his belief that we are gradually evolving to this status, and its advent is so near that it is time to prepare those to whom its meaning is of vast import, so that they may partake of the benefit.

Nothing is surer than that the next great progressive move in the moving picture field is to be along these lines. Naturally the first expression comes from abroad, where vaudeville has not encroached as it has here; hence the film-makers of Europe have been greatly encouraged to raise the level of their offerings gradually, yet constantly. The writer is reluctant to make prophecies, but he wishes to go on record as predicting that within two years' time in the most fashionable locales of New York and other great cities will be found newly built theatres of cinematography where the prices will be higher for admission than they have been up to now, and where many features novel and progressive will lend enhancement to the finest productions which have emanated from the camera man.

We are now decidedly in the age of great achievement. In a period within a few months New York has seen two new and gorgeous music halls of the Continental type rise in the Long Acre district. In these the scale of prices for admission are a shade higher than even the legitimate theatres charge, and nearly double the highest at the best vaudeville theatres.

Cinematography has had vogue in this country now for close to eighteen years. It is not to be questioned in view of the millions of dollars invested that the better class of film-makers will permit further encroachment on their line of endeavor, and it is wholly within their province to undertake to prevent the use of the more than ten thousand theatres built in the last decade as a result of the vogue of cinematography for other purposes, and the time has now arrived when they must make a sustained effort to raise immeasurably the artistic level of their productions.

Already some of the beautiful theatres above named have reverted to other usage—the inclination towards stock dramatic companies can only be stampeded by a display of enterprise that will provide the exhibitor with the proper incentive. The latter element are well aware that thre is a tremendous public which resents the encroachmnt of vaudeville, and it is this public which will flock to the stock theatres for relief.

What is now required is a well-organized effort to typify the art of cinematography by creating a number of establishments where only science and artifice shall hold sway, and for such there will come a family patronage so overwhelming and so constant that the problem, as far as encroachment is concerned will have been solved.

With an admission scale ranging from ten to twenty-five cents prevailing, the exhibitor will seek to provide every possible attractive feature that has a tendency toward constructive results, and this will undoubtedly find expression quickly in the musical phase of the subject, and a good orchestra will be as compelling in this respect as it will be useful in aiding the exhibitor to think out innovations of an uplifting character.

It is with such an environment as is here merely intimated that the genius and artistry of the world will be attracted to, and then, and then only, will the theatres of cinematography become veritable art institutions and bring out the scenarios of a class of writers who heretofore found nothing in common with them to tempt them into activity, for let us not forget that it is only very recently that the foremost authors would permit their names to be used for vaudeville endeavor, but the uplifting process became so pronounced, when the world's greatest players were tempted to appear in these theatres, that the playwrights could no longer resist those importuning them to do likewise.

At the present moment—and it is a vital one—the art of cinematography needs a vigorous impetus, such as would come from a combined effort to elevate the grade of its output. This is so evident that we find competition strong for the services of the best players, but the future of this really tremendous field of endeavor lies far deeper and can only find vivid realization by creating in the larger cities a number of exclusive establishments along the lines of the Eden Musee, but which will be wholly and solely devoted to the one effort—that of raising the artistic level of a great art—Cinematography.

Characterization

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

I have received a number of inquiries from playwrights which I cannot find time to answer directly, but one of these raises a question of deep interest to playmakers. Rearranged for the sake of brevity, it is:

"Are not many excellent plays written and produced without characterization yet so full of incident and situation that they prove to be entertaining?"

Instead of answering in positive terms let us get out into the audience and have a look at any old play that comes along.

Perhaps the opening of the pictured story is that of a mother dying in poverty.

The painted scene is that of a bare room with alleged laths showing through the broken plaster; the settings are a broken table, an empty bottle, a decrepit chair and a wretched bed covered with rags. This is all for an effect which is not produced. We shed no tears over the scene painter's ideas of art. On the bed is a dying woman made up with hollow cheeks and lots of black under the eyes; she listens to the vain appeal of her hungry child (usually robust enough in the legs), looks distressed, has a fit of coughing and sinks back into the pillow. The situation and incident are intended to be affecting, but we do not know anything about the mother and child, our interest in strangers is comparatively limited, and men and women must be something more than marionettes for us to care what becomes of them. Now suppose that incident is used to bring out character. The feeble mother rises and makes a last despairing effort for the sake of her child. Let her show bravery in the face of death, display noble self-abnegation by sacrificing her last shred of hope for the little one, and she will stir the human pulse because our sympathies are quickened by the glimpse we are given of a courageous and unselfish character.

Out in the audience it is not necessary for us to know that incident and situation are devised from the very first moment to bring out individual traits and so introduce the people in the play that we may feel there is something in them akin to ourselves, but that development of the roles is going on in all plays that please from the first moment of presentation, delicately interwoven with the story itself. The fact that many authors and some directors seem to be in ignorance of this essential in the dramatic art is in no respect discreditable to them as individuals, but it helps account for the large number of photoplays that stay flat on the screen absolutely meaningless to those who sit in front. The right incident and situation to bring out character and build up a play that will reach out to the people is so rarely provided by the author that I have yet to see a scenario containing what is known to be an absolute essential. It is left for the director, already occupied with a thousand other details, to supply what is really the essence of human interest, the play's appeal to human nature.

In farce-comedy alone can characterization be subordinated to incident and situation; to leave it out is like trying to make a watch run with one of the important wheels missing, something beyond the ability of any amateur to accomplish. It is all right to attend the picture shows and remark that a large number of the pictures shown seem especially devised for an exhibition at some institution for the feeble-minded, but that does not mean that you can write a scenario containing all the dramatic essentials in nice proportion. You may see the play in some glow of the imagination as you may see some new form of battleship in a dream, but that does not mean that you can build one.

I have been told by many directors that not one in twenty scenarios is worthy of examination; the writers seem to think that one swallow makes a summer. About one in a hundred scenarios contains an idea, one of the wheels of the clock; the director is supposed to supply the rest. Let George do it!

A play must be as carefully constructed as a fine musical composition, it is not a five-finger exercise. When a production on the screen not only partakes of the author's weakness, but of the director's peculiarities and the scene painter's infirmities thrown in, it is no matter of wonder that so few are successful. Incident and situation alone are bad enough on the real stage; on the screen, where there is a blend of the artistic and the dramatic, mere clap-trap is ruinous.

Any tremendous or moving scene springs from a conflict or contrast of characters; if they move about like massed supers on the stage, are purely automatic, the purpose of the story is hidden from the audience and the story itself a meaningless blank. In our daily experience we are amused or disgusted by this or that type brought to our attention because some trait of character sticks out, because something they do is a revelation of character easily recognized, we must display the man by exhibiting his passions before his actions are accountable and in accordance with our ideas of what is true to nature. We recognize in the clash of personalities on the stage something closely related to our own experience in the never-ending struggle. The whole essence of interest lies not in the situation itself, but in what it brings out in those engaged in solving it.

If picture plays are to be life-like, if they are to stir our pulses and set our hearts to beating higher, if they are to get a strong grip on sustained interest, they must reflect human nature in some recognizable form, just as we know it in the men and women brought into the circle of our acquaintance, they must have certain salient characteristics.

Characterization is brought out in strong situations as a natural resultant of those situations if the play is rightly built, and the story in which we become most deeply interested will be found, on close examination, to be a series of incidents leading to some readjustment of the characters in action after these characters have been unfolded like a flower from bud to full bloom.

> "The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
> But in ourselves, that we are underlings."

Some More About Daylight Pictures.

Discussion on the subject of lighted theaters is always more or less agreeable because the ideas regarding the proper "systems" for "daylight" or "lighted house" projection are so widely at variance.

Screens of the various types, screen coatings, and so on three very clever arrangements of "unique" projection are the results, directly or indirectly, of an endeavor to overcome the necessity of having the theater dark and a menace to the proper advancement of the moving picture business as a whole.

There are numerous difficulties to be overcome in every instance, each theater presents new and totally different conditions and therefore there is really no "cut and dried" method that will give the results without the harmonious adjustment of all the general conditions.

The Chas. L. Kiewert Company, at Cortlandt Street, New York, importers of the Big Carbon, have utilized their unlimited facilities for gathering up to the minute information on the projection of daylight pictures and have placed the same at the disposal of our readers. Now, as heretofore, their information is free for the asking and just to weld more closely their association with the individual exhibitor

The Writing of a Scenario.

A Practical Article on Scenario Preparation, Choice of Motive and Theme, Handling a "Crime," and Portraying Character for a Photoplay.

By George Rockhill Craw.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—Mr. Craw's articles on "The Technique of the Photoplay," of which this is one, are invaluable to all theater-goers wishing to post themselves thoroughly and generally on their business. This applies to the man who selects the films for a theater as well as to the ambitious scenario writer; he is, rather, a connoisseur, amateur or master. You may have a good idea for a scenario but do not know how to develop it so as to present it as an acceptable scenario to a producer. The articles will help you. You may be ambitious to become the manager or owner of a theater. If so, you cannot be too well posted on the Technique of the Photoplay. Previous articles appeared in our issues of Jan. 21 and Jan. 28, 1910, Feb. 4, 1911 and March 25, 1911.

One day I received back a scenario from a house that is most courteous in its treatment of that somewhat "insignificant" entity, the scenario writer, with the statement that the manuscript was unavailable because it contained a crime. I mention this because I shall cite examples from this particular scenario to illustrate my present article on that important element, photoplay technique.

It seems to me that the pendulum swings much too far the other way when all incidents of crime must be excluded from scenarios to make them acceptable. I believe, however, that in the present state of the tabloid drama if a crime is an essential it should be done "beautifully," as Hedda Gabler would say.

Everything depends upon the surroundings. There is nothing offensive or vicious in a gentlemanly rapier-thrust through the laces of a Florentine courtier's tunic, in a leafy, moonlit scene of the long ago, but a vulgar present-day holdup and murder shocks grownups and vitiates youth.

The latter crime is contemporary—realistic—suggestive. It shows the practicable—the present—the what-may-be-done. The former one is romantic—abstract. It portrays the past—the motives and methods of a time gone by, and of a sphere removed.

The time of a play may be even contemporaneous with that of the audience, but if the motives and methods of the crime acted are those of a different sphere of life from that of the audience, there is but little suggestion; the crime has small power to vitiate, and any bad effect may be effectively eliminated by the play's denouement, in which is witnessed the punishment or retribution of the perpetrator.

Owners of theaters, desirous to select harmless but interesting films, should bear the above fact in mind in choosing films. To omit crime entirely from all plays would produce a colorless, puerile and intolerable drama. Crime has been a part of most of the great dramatic compositions since the world began. It gives life and lesson to the productions of the theater.

THE SCENARIO.

I have selected "The Fox Hunt," with which to show how the scenario should be prepared before it is submitted to a producer. The size of the manuscript pages from which this scenario is printed are 8½x11 inches. The titles, captions and text are typewritten; the titles and captions being enclosed in boxes, ruled off with pen and ink. The pages are each numbered consecutively, and only one side of the sheet is used.

THE FOX HUNT.

A Drama.

By George Rockhill Craw.
Copyright 1910.

Producers:

CHARACTERS:

Clay Forrest.....A Gallant
Robert Porter .....A Gallant
Virginia Warren .....Mistress of Warren Hall
Huntsmen, Ladies, Grooms, Servants.

SCENE: The Manor and Estate of Warren Hall. TIME: 1830.

Caption Flash:

THE EVE OF THE HUNT.

THE COTILLION AT WARREN HALL.

SCENE: The ball-room at Warren Hall. A grand old room of Colonial type, with cream sombrely lighted chandeliers. It is night. A fashionable cotillion is in progress, the gentlemen and ladies being elegantly costumed in the dancing dress of early nineteenth century. A number of pretty figures are given through the progression in the lively, colored paper caps, etc. At the center of the room is a punch bowl, presided over by an old darky in footman's livery. It is a conventional, old-fashioned cotillion.

ACTION: Miss Virginia Warren, with a train of admirers, among whom she shows Porter and Forrest most favor, gather at the punch bowl. An elder, but handsome belle with a couple of elderly admirers watches them, occasionally scandalizing the company by her caustic remarks. Finally, the elder woman gets Forrest and Porter to one side.

Caption Flash:

"THEY SAY ONE OF YOU TWO YOUNG MEN WILL WIN THE FOX HUNT TO-MORROW. WHY NOT HAVE A RACE TO-NIGHT! WHICH OF YOU CAN WIN MISS VIRGINIA'S HAND"

Bob Porter is dark and handsome. Clay Forrest is of lighter complexion, and with a more frank and trusting expression. Both men are well knit and about of a height. They are friends and meet the lady's laughing proposal in a spirit of lighthearted merriment. They agree each to propose to Virginia, and decide who shall be first by Porter's taking a large coin from his pocket and holding it in one hand, both hands behind him so that the audience can see his hands but so that Forrest cannot. Both men at once become deadly earnest, and it can be seen that Virginia is a matter of great importance to each of them. Forrest chooses the right hand, and Porter who has the coin in his right hand, quickly and deftly shifts it to left, at once holding out both hands, with the coin in the left one. Only the audience has seen the fraud. Forrest and the elderly lady laugh off the defeat and they with Porter good luck as he goes to seek out Virginia, whom he finds and leads from the crowded room, all eyes upon them as the dance goes on, for Virginia is considered a great catch.

SCENE: The veranda of Warren Hall. A beautiful flower and vine embowered corner. A window of the house opens into it.

ACTION: Porter and Virginia come out upon the veranda and after a little conversation he proposes to her with much elegant gallantry. The elderly lady and her two elderly male escorts peek laughingly out at the window. Forrest is not with them.

Caption Flash:

"I WILL GIVE YOU MY ANSWER TO-MORROW, AT THE 'STIRRUP CUP.'"

Virginia answers Porter as above, indicating the stirrup cup by making a goblet of her hand and pretending to drink from it. Porter tries to kiss her hand, but she coquettishly withdraws it. She expresses a determination to return to the dance, cleverly and prettily evading his attempts at gentlemanly endearments. They return to the dance.

SCENE: The ball-room.

ACTION: Porter returns with Virginia, and they mix in the crowd. Porter joins the elderly trio and Forrest, and they ask him what luck? He indicates that he has received no answer but that it will be given to him in the morning at the stirrup cup. The mischief makers urge Forrest to propose but Forrest denies his right to do so. The rest laugh at Porter and urge Forrest to go ahead. He does so, with Porter looking darkly after him, as he seeks out Dorothy and escorts her from the room.

SCENE: A corner of the veranda, as before.

ACTION: Forrest and Virginia come upon the veranda. It is evident that he is ill at ease in her presence. He proposes stammeringly and she laughs at him, but watches him coquettishly as he averts his gaze. The elderly trio are again eavesdropping at the window, and Porter is with them. Forrest asks Virginia for an answer, and she tells him she will give it to him in the morning at the "stirrup cup." Forrest is ready to go in to the ball-room, but Virginia hangs back, giving him every opportunity to kiss her hand, her cheek, and even her lips, all done in a very delicate way, but the diffident Forrest is not daring enough to attempt what he does not know she is offering. The elderly eavesdroppers are laughing greatly among themselves, but Porter's face is dark with jealousy and rage. Virginia, tired of Forrest's timidity, sweeps majestically by him with Forrest at her heels. She does not of course show this pique to Forrest, but to the audience. The eavesdroppers withdraw at once as the couple start to go in. Forrest in his awkwardness steps on Virginia's dress. She whirls on him with an intended rebuff, but controlls herself quickly, and haughtily accepts his stammered apology.

SCENE: The ball-room.

ACTION: Forrest and Virginia rejoin the dancers. Forrest at length joining the elderly trio, who hypocritically ask him what luck? As he tells them he will be given his answer at the stirrup cup, they laugh among themselves, for they already know what Virginia's answer was. Porter is not with them but watches darkly from a distance. A waltz strikes up and all get partners and the scene ends in a pretty dance.

THE MORNING OF THE HUNT.

SCENE: The great pillared porch of the manor and the fine grounds in front of it.

ACTION: Packs of hounds, horses, grooms, and huntsmen are gathering and moving about. All is in preparation for the big hunt. Saddles all cinched, stirrups adjusted, dogs held in leash. Virginia and a party of ladies in riding habits, and with riding crops, come upon the scene. They greet the horses and the hounds, and the huntsmen, in their red coats and jaunty leather riding hats and spurs, escort them about.

Caption Flash:

HER FAVORITE HOUND, KING ROLAND,

GREETS VIRGINIA.

A great hound breaks its leash and bounding to Virginia's side, fawns upon her. She fondles him. The preparations grow more bustling, the ladies withdraw, a bugler winds his horn, the hunt closing round him.

Caption Flash:

THE STIRRUP CUP.

SCENE: The great, white curved steps of the veranda. A punch bowl, presided over by Virginia in her riding habit, with the liveried colored footman behind her.

ACTION: The mounted huntsmen and ladies come up and are served by Virginia, in their saddles. Porter and Forrest are denied their cup till all are served. Then Virginia calls them to her and gives each a cup of punch, holding one herself.

Caption Flash:

"MY HAND SHALL GO TO THE ONE OF YOU

TWO WHO BRINGS ME THE FOX'S BRUSH.

HERE'S TO THE HUNT!"

She raises her cup, followed by the two men and they drink to the success of the hunt. A groom is holding Virginia's horse nearby. Forrest and Porter dismount in a race to see who shall help her to mount it. Porter wins, and Virginia smiles radiantly down upon him. The hunt moves off.

Caption Flash:

GONE AWAY!

SCENE CHANGE: The hunt is shown moving down a country road, the hounds in the lead. A field is entered, the scent found, the bugler sounds "Gone Away!" and the hunt is in full cry after the fox. If the actors are not expert fox hunters, show parts of the hunt where others make spectacular jumps, etc., but have this a part of the progress of the main hunt. This may be easily done as a hunt always straggles. At length Forrest, Porter and Virginia, riding between them, must be shown riding hard, and in the lead behind the hounds. They are riding down a narrow road. A child is playing in the middle of the road the hounds having passed it, leaving it unharmed. The mounted hunting flowers further on. As Forrest, Virginia and Porter near the child, they wheel aside, Porter riding on, but Forrest and Virginia drawing rein. Forrest jumps to the ground and rushes the child aside as the rest of the hunt in a compact mass rides by at terrific speed. The mother has rushed up and thanked Forrest hysterically for saving her baby's life. She is waiting and congratulates him with very bright eyes. Forrest quickly remounts and putting to his horse leaves Virginia in a twinkling as he rides for his life to overtake the hunt and win the brush. Virginia has urged him on and now she clasps her hands to see him fly along and clasps them in a silent prayer. Then she too rides hard after the hunt.

Forrest overtakes and passes the main body of horsemen and women, and is pressing Porter hard for first place behind the hounds.

Caption Flash:

"IN AT THE DEATH!"

The hounds are running in full cry. Forrest passes Porter who is black with rage. No one else is in view. The hounds are crossing a field that is stony and full of long grass. The fox is overtaken by the hounds, and Forrest, ahead of Porter, leaps off his horse to save the brush from the hounds. As he raises the body of the fox aloft, thus winning the hunt, Porter has dismounted and in a murderous rage strikes him a blow near the temple with his riding crop, and Forrest sinks to the earth. Porter takes the brush from his successful hand, and then notices that Forrest's blood is on his riding crop. He at once throws his riding crop away, but Forrest's coat is tightly clutched in Porter's left hand. Porter's coup is thus lost in the deep grasses where he has quickly thrown it after discovering the blood on it. He furtively grasps the brush near the others are. He stoops over Forrest and is holding him as the others come up. Porter holds the brush in his hand.

Caption Flash:

"HIS HORSE STUMBLED AND THREW HIM."

Porter makes the above explanation as the huntsmen gather round. Virginia tenderly ties a bandage around Forrest's head, having been at it from her assistance. Forrest then opens his eyes and starts to his feet. Then he sees Porter holding him up. Porter offers to give her the brush but she shows him without saying it. Then she overlooks out her hand for it in a dutiful way, for she is determined not to go back on her word, but before she can take it Forrest, seeing Porter's bloody coup on the ground, picks it up. Porter's blood-stained riding coup in the hound's mouth. Virginia takes it from him, and starts back at the blood. She then accuses Porter of having struck Forrest with it. The other men menace him and he backs away, dropping the brush. Virginia picks it up, and gives it to Forrest to wave, and with the head of the fox that he had won it, she tucks it from her, then he points to Virginia's hand and she clasps her other hand over his and the brush. He extends his arm accusingly at Porter, who shrinks further back as Forrest tells how he struck him after he had won the brush. Virginia throws her arms elongingly about Forrest's neck, and he clasps her to his heart, kissing her lips.

(The End.)

NOTES: If the hound cannot be made to act his part, the blood-stained coup can be found by one of the huntsmen, or by Virginia. If the huntsman finds it, Virginia should take it from him and substitute Porter with it herself.

By the use of the anis bag, the trail can be made to lead past the camera at any point desired. At the "death" a live fox can be thrown amongst the hounds.

THE CHOICE OF THE MOTIVE AND PLOT.

The motif of the foregoing scenario is a fox hunt. From the opening, showing a hunt ball, to the death of the fox at the end, the plot, which is made up of a love affair between a girl and two rival suitors, is motivated by the hunt.

At the very beginning of the drama, the elderly, fun-loving dame is put up to suggesting a contest between Porter and Forrest for Virginia's hand, because the winning of the hunt is conceded to lie between these two gallants.

Virginia's answer to each is also motivated by the fox hunt. She will marry the one who brings her the fox's brush, and from then on, every incident of the play is a part of the hunt; up to the Catastrophe, where Forrest is felled by Porter, through the denouement, where Forrest triumphs and claims his bride as she confidingly hands him the brush he has so fairly won

STRIVES FOR NEW EFFECTS.

The author chose a fox-hunting motive because it was something new in photoplays and presented nothing difficult in production to a producing house who could gain the cooperation of one of the many hunt clubs in the East and South. It presented an opportunity to stage the play in antibellum days, with their quaint ball costumes and smart hunting regalia, which latter has changed but little, if any, since that time. It offered occasion for picturesque effects, such as the gathering of the hunt-horses, hounds, huntsmen, and all—in front of a majestic old manor. Besides, it brought out the splendid chance for that popular feature of photoplays, under a new guise—the chase.

What could make a more thrilling riding scene than a pack of hounds in full cry, led past the camera by an anis bag, dragged along, unseen, far ahead of them, with the huntsmen thundering by behind them, taking fences, jumping ditches, and running like mad over open ground? Add to this the interest in the rival leaders, Porter and Forrest, and in their fair prize, Virginia, all entwined in a plot worked out with the sincerest regard for form, structure and logical technique, in order to attain the height of illusion, and we arrive at that most "terrible" point, the "crime," where Porter strikes Forrest with his riding crop and fells him.

DEADENING THE "CRIME."

How has the author arranged for the deadening of whatever vicious effect the "crime" may have upon the audience?

In the first place he has staged the piece in anti-bellum days. The characters are aristocratic—a part of a small and exclusive circle of bygone days. They move in a different sphere from that of their audience. There is little chance for suggestion, and the "crime" itself may be done as "beautifully" as a fine ebony riding crop, mounted with silver and ivory, in the hands of a low-blooded, red-coated, oblique young Southerner will permit.

Then, too, Porter suffers the punishment of exposure, the contempt of his fellows and the loss of Virginia, for his act

THE PORTRAYAL OF CHARACTER.

"The persons of a drama are significantly called characters, and the necessity for distinctness in their respective functions is very strong," says Price. The same excellent authority says that "character is to be studied most in detail by the playwright just as carefully as he has worked out the plot and developed the acts and scenes. It requires a special meditation of its own." Price writes of the "legitimate," the spoken drama, but his words apply with equal force to the photoplay.

"The brief action of a drama and art itself rejects a multitude of non-essential things, but in effect it is possible to reproduce characters on the stage, with an illusion that is practically perfect," goes on Price. This, too, is true of the photoplay, although the author is thrice limited therein as compared to the action of the much longer "legitimate" drama, with its greater opportunities for elaborate portrayal, not only in length of time, but through the elastic medium of speech.

Again, Price says: "What we know of the character of a man is after all the general knowledge of that man. He is good, bad, generous, miserly, brave, or craven—as the case may be. How he affects appears to be. It is what he proves himself to be in the affairs in which he or she acts. As Aristotle says, character must be manifested. I think it is needless to say that it is dramatical—must be built up in a sensational, logical way."

THE CHARACTERS IN THE FOX HUNT.

When the author had germinated his plot and knew that he would make Porter's character bad and Forrest's good, he began at once to show these traits to the small-e qualities of the two men, so that the most enormous act of Porter's should come last and so lead up to logically by interesting bad methods of small-ness upon his part first, we find him cheating with the coin; then comes his self-assurance, bordering upon liberty, when he proposes to Virginia; then he gravely spies on Forrest with the other mischief makers when the latter proposes to Virginia; next, he rides heartlessly by the child in the dangerous road-way, intent only on his own interests, and finally he feels Forrest with a murderous blow in order to win the brush and Virginia.

THE CONTRASTING OF CHARACTER.

Just as Porter's bad character is built up with cumulative effect and interest, so, also is Forrest's good character.

We see him first imposed upon by Porter when he trustingly chooses the coin. Next, he is absent from the elderly eavesdroppers when Porter proposes to Virginia. When he, himself, proposes we find him bashful and diffident instead of bold—the characters of the two men each being illuminated by this contrast. Next, we see him stopping his horse to save the child in the road, at the price of losing the hunt and the girl he loves, as Porter dashes on in the chase; this bringing out another sharp character contrast, and furnishing a lofty reason for the theretofore coquettish Virginia's final, sincere love for him.

Virginia's character, too, is built up logically during the short period of the little play. Her thoughtless worldliness gives way as she, too, draws rein while Forrest rescues the child, and we see her better nature manifested in her immediate judgment of the value of such an act, by her glad tears and her anxiety that the diffident Forrest shall win the brush. Thus are we prepared for her righteous and majestic scorn as she accuses Porter of the blow with the riding crop, and for her tender solicitude for the wounded Forrest, as well as for her final, happy yielding as he claims her for his own.

SYMPATHETIC EFFECT OF CHARACTER TRAITS.

Forrest's trustfulness and diffidence is designed to gain for him the sympathy of the audience, for he is manly about it all, which sympathy is quickly heightened to admiration when he saves the child.

Virginia is made a coquette to keep the two suitors and the audience guessing, as well as to make her human, having a thoughtless and a tender side. Thus when Porter rides on while Forrest and Virginia stop to save the child, the audience is brought to a full realization that these two are fitted for each other because of their humane qualities, but holds its breath as it realizes that Porter is now far ahead in the chase, and that seemingly no matter how hard Virginia urges Forrest to ride, she will have to marry Porter.

Up and up goes the interest as Forrest gains on the huntsmen, passes them, gains on Porter, who has the lead, reaches his side and passes him, gaining the brush among the hounds only to be struck down by Porter as he grasps it.

This catastrophe, in its retardation of a happy denouement, is an effective piece of dramatic technique for enhancing the suspense and at the same time for preparing for a more effective and climacteric ending of the drama, in which the blood-stained riding crop is found, Porter confronted and confounded, with Forrest and Virginia safe in each others arms.

Miss Lois Weber, Leading Lady—Rex Stock Co.

The Little Major (Rex)

A top-notcher and possibly the strongest drama ever presented with a child in the leading role is "The Little Major." It is perhaps safe to place this play in the moving picture Hall of Fame, because it combines all the elements of success in nice proportions. With a star cast, all the subordinate roles taken by leaders, and a little genius in the title role, directed by a big one behind the camera, the finished product is a play which will satisfy all classes. It tells a beautiful story, one which can be shown in a church or serve to entertain a Bowery audience. Such plays are few in number, painfully few; more of them would place the exhibiting business on a solid foundation of permanent prosperity.

In spite of its high merits this release is not beyond criticism, especially in the artificiality of the painted scenes. They are not up to the settings. The nursery scenes, very attractive in many respects, were entirely too short. They could have been made twice as long in the comedy portions to the general betterment, especially the children's Indian chase. There is too much diffused illumination in the moonlit scenes. They would have appealed more strongly to the imagination if given in semi-darkness so as to intensify the moonlight streaming through the windows. The nearest approach to the ideal condition is seen in the near view of mother and child where the lighting was more in accordance with the spirit of the play with a corresponding gain in power.

"The Little Major" has its own peculiar charm, possibly because it is a story of human love in a pure form, one that we all recognize, as without alloy of self-interest, that of childhood. It is a boy's simple love, the kind all manly men have felt, so simple that it seems to contain no dramatic opportunity, yet so strong in this case that it boldly challenges death. With this common human sentiment as the mainspring of action, a play of unusual power has been constructed, which moves without sub-title, and without a break in continuity from opening scenes of ordinary home life, through a series of interesting pictures to a powerful crisis and happy finale.

The main incident in the crisis, that of calling back a soul on the threshold of death, is far from the ordinary, but it is more than probable because it is founded on actual experience. There are recorded instances where the voice of a loved one pleading constantly in the ear of an unconscious and dying man or woman has actually reached the departing soul, weary of its struggle, and encouraged it to make one more effort, affording a stimulus to effort not obtainable from other sources. The situation is not unknown, but this is its first presentation in a picture play, possibly in any presentation whatever. Whether it is new or old, however, matters little; it is strong, and it is worked up with great care in this masterly little play.

Associated Motion Picture Patents Co.

Important Public Meeting in New York.

Under the auspices of the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company a large gathering of persons prominent in financial, religious, sociological, educational and artistic work, met on Thursday evening, April 13th, at the Eden Musee, 55 West 23d Street, New York City, to discuss the moving picture in its relation to public progress and the uplifting of conditions of life.

The meeting was convened at the special instance of Mr. Rich. G. Hollaman, president of the Eden Musee, and vice-president of the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company.

Mr. Hollaman placed the large hall of the Musee at the disposal of the guests and provided a special exhibition of the latest moving pictures, which included Italian, German, French and American subjects. The company was much interested in and delighted with the brilliant display which was given by the aid of the new projector, the invention of Messrs. Porter and Cannock.

Mr. Hollaman in addressing the meeting said:

"In its cleanest form, the motion picture is the greatest public educator of the age. To illustrate the immensity of its influence, two years ago the Steel Trust did a business of $486,000,000. What the Standard Oil took in I don't know, but I do know that this business, starting in the humble way that it did at the Eden Musee fifteen years ago, took in $300,-100,000 last year in 20,000 shows scattered throughout the country."

Following Mr. Hollaman, Mr. Wm. H. Story, secretary of the Board of Censors of the People's Institute, addressed the meeting.

Mr. Story dwelt upon the importance of uplifting the moving picture business by improving the quality of the picture, a policy, which he understood, was that of the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company. The importance of the moving picture as an educational agency was commended by Mr. Story, who also pointed out the value of the picture for religious teaching.

Among those present at the gathering were: Wm. H. Stone, president of the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company; J. A. Leggett, secretary and general manager of the company; Thomas Bedding, C. Lang Cobb, Jr., J. Aspinwall Hodge, Commissioner Thompson, Robert A. Dowling, James A. Stillman, Louis W. Slocum of Brooklyn, Wm. P. Knowles, W. A. Kilbowen, Hon. George J. Corey, Chas. R. Smith, representing "American Commerce and Industries"; Frank Strauss, Michael Furst, D. A. Jacobson, representatives of the Dramatic Mirror and Billboard; F. H. Richardson and H. F. Hoffman (Moving Picture World), Mr. Drehr (International Film Theater), Mr. Barry (of London), Christopher Lakeman, E. T. Fallows, Ben Falk, C. G. Klager, representatives of the Missionary Moving Picture Association, and many others.

CRANE AT HEFLICH'S, WEST HOBOKEN.

"The Thunderbolt Kid" having, as related in this paper, made a hit of large proportions in her talk at Heflich's Theater, Summit Ave., West Hoboken, a short while ago, the theater management decided to put on another Thunderbolt the last Saturday night, and Frank Crane, the leading man, received a rush order to come over. Manager Kutler, of Heflich's, and Lecturer Smith proceeded to tell the crowds that Crane was coming, and rigged up a lobby display with some rapidity, with the result that the talked-of "Thunderbolt" faced a capacity house. Manager Kutler says his patrons have expressed to him their appreciation of his efforts to show them their screen favorites in the flesh.

Frank Crane's "Tom of the Bronx Section of the Greater City" begins at Rehm's Nineland, Westchester Avenue. Before it is over, it is expected that crane will have done his talk in every Independent theater in the borough. Independents in the other boroughs are invited to send in their applications for Mr. Crane's appearance at their houses at any time, and to select the dates themselves.

PICTURE AND VAUDEVILLE EXHIBITORS.

We would like to draw the attention of those exhibitors who run vaudeville with the picture, to the advertisement of Taylor's Theatrical Agency on another page of this paper. In a recent issue of the Moving Picture World we made mention of Mr. Taylor's intention to add a vaudeville department to his already popular school for operators, by which addition he hopes to be in a position to supply any talent for a picture theater that may be desired, from usher to manager, or whether it be on the floor stage or operating booth.

It will probably be of interest to the managers and owners of picture and vaudeville houses to learn that Mr. Taylor has "put one over" on all of the other booking agencies doing business in this field, by supplying a Free Song Slide Service to his prospering booking department, thereby enabling managers and singers to secure the very latest illustrated songs at no additional cost, providing they patronize the Taylor establishment in their selection of any kind of talent, or even purchasing these supplies for the theatre. To equip this new department to meet the certain competition it will have to face, Taylor has expended several thousand dollars and given his standing order to every music house of song slides for their latest releases.

A NEW EXHIBITOR.

To deprive the statement often quoted, that moving pictures are entertaining only for the younger set, the Nicholas Power Co. has just installed a number six Powers cosmograph with dissolving connections attachment in Sailors' Snug Harbor, Staten Island, for the amusement of the old sailors no longer fit for duty on the ocean there of today, who are housed and otherwise taken care of at this resort.

What next?

One of the recent surprises in the motion picture world was the announcement that Mr. Waters would soon cease to be general manager of the General Film Company. I am not a Johnny Wiseacreson, as any other part of the fortune-telling craft, but will confess that when Mr Waters was first proclaimed the chief of the 10 Fifth Avenue Wigwam I predicted his reign would be of short duration. His many years of fidelity to the Edison Company, the fountain spring of the Motion Picture Patents Company, of which the General Film Company is practically an offshoot, made Mr. Waters the logical appointee for the position. I say appointee because I have every reason to believe that Mr. Waters was never a candidate for the job. As near as I can get to the official dope the position was forced upon him. Mr. Waters has made a lot of money in the picture business and if he could train himself to believe that he is not in need of the lots of money still to be made in the business he would be enjoying retired life. More than a dozen times he has stated that he wished he could retire, and an equal number of times he declared there was not money enough to induce him to become general manager of the General Film Co. I believe he was serious at all times, but $5,000 a year is enough to change any man's mind. But I will make one positive declaration without fear of contradiction: Mr. Waters took the position practically as a sacrifice. He knew he had a tough job to tackle, but he went at it determinedly and bravely. Many of his intimate friends viewed the undertaking with grave doubts. They knew him as an indefatigable worker with a spirit defying all adversities, present or remote. What, to many, would appear a very remunerative salary was to him almost a stipend. His film exchange is good for at the very least $100 a week to him personally, to this latter salary was comparatively nominal—in accord neither with the responsibility, nor his capabilities. If permitted to make one good guess I would say that Mr. Waters took the job as an accommodation to others. No official announcement has yet been made regarding the matter. Like many others, whether or not there be a reason for it, Mr. Waters has some friends who carry a knife up their sleeve and are constantly awaiting an opportunity to get a slash at him. These friends are quite positive that Mr. Waters is not relinquishing his job of his own volition. There are others who maintain that Mr. Waters is taking advantage of a long-looked-for opportunity. Whether or not he is returning under fire, it is undeniable that nothing can give him more gratification than the relinquishment of the very arduous duties. The one best bet is that when he packs his grip and walks down the steps from the Fifth Avenue mansion he will seek a well-deserved rest.

There has been much speculation as to who will succeed the bright-haired overseer of General Film destinies. A Mr. Kane has figured very prominently in the lime light. Mr. Kane, I believe, hails from Seattle, Washington, having been identified with a film exchange there for some time. For some time past he has figured as "special representative" for General Film. In this capacity he has traveled considerably and the knowledge acquired in the position is said to eminently qualify him as a successor to Mr. Waters. An eleventh-hour report says Mr. Kennedy—you all have heard of him—is to take the job. I do not wish to be understood as saying anything derogatory to Mr. Kane, but if the supreme court of the Patents Company wants or will take the job neither Mr. Kane nor any other man can get it; and if Mr. Kennedy takes the job, look out; a more resourceful, aggressive, persevering and point-getting man I have never met. They talk about what may happen if J. Pierpont Morgan should die. Many predict a great turbulance in the financial world. Let such people take a tip from me: The very moment that the great Morgan feels that he is about to depart whence he cannot take his paintings, bric-a-brac and rarities let them look out for a big slump. They know they will find a man who can give the Goliath of the banking world cards and spades. He is certainly one century plant.

I see Marcus Loew has incorporated another company. This time it is a five million dollar concern. I do not see the names of Percy G. Williams or William Morris among the incorporators. In a spirit of what I thought was humor I recently compared the moving picture business with that of the Standard Oil Company, with regard to financial magnitude. I did not intend to be prophetic in the least. Five million dollars! By you Shuberts, Erlangers and others! Dig down, you are getting behind the times. Rumor has had it for some time that Mr. Loew was a millionaire. I am inclined to believe that he is. "Dave" Bernstein, Mr. Loew's right-hand man, is one of the incorporators. Well, Dave, you are certainly a busy guy. Every time I have met you the world seemed to be one of all work and no revenue. Time and again I have heard you say that if you were worth as much as so-and-so you would not be in the picture business. You cunning rascal. But, hold! What is this thought that flashes through my brain? Can it be that the foundation of this five times one million dollars is what General Film paid for the Eagle's Film Exchange?

A young man in New York is editing a booklet he calls a moving picture weekly. I chanced to pick up one of the numbers and read what is supposed to be an editorial criticising the Moving Picture World on the stand it has taken regarding the national convention of moving picture exhibitors. I have plucked two weighty arguments from the article. Here they are: "If they (referring to the World) had brains enough to think of anything good enough to hold a meeting about," etc. Isn't that a gem of literary construction? Think of the weight it must carry, "hold a meeting about." About what? Oh, piffle. Here is the other: "They are keenly on the lookout for any excuse to agitate disturbance." What is an agitated disturbance? Is it related to a round circle? Eh, wot?

The summer is again around and soon his hammer upon the skirting boards will sound. The airdome banner will soon be flying in the breeze again and the inhabitants of the neighboring tenements will be spared the travel to the nickelodeon around the corner. Yes, the good old summer time and the airdome season are fast approaching, and will soon be hand in hand greeting the young and old who seek the motion pictures in the open air. For goodness sake let the showman display better sense than he has in the past, if he hopes to clear expenses. Most of them labor under the impression that the people who patronize the open-air places do not go to the winter houses and that any old thing will go with them. There is a method in this, of course. Pictures sixty or more days old do not cost as much as the later productions. Perhaps I have not got this right. I mean that the showman need not pay as much for the former as the latter. They really cost more. What is saved at the film exchange is lost at the airdome box office. There was a time when airdomes were looked upon as novelties and almost any old programme would fill the bill, but the novelty has worn off and the airdome man will find that he must make good to the public as well as the proprietors of the winter places. There was considerable complaint last summer by patrons of open-air places because the airdomes were serving junk films and the man who does not start out on the right line this season will have trouble in gaining popularity for his place.

I am requested to decide as to which is the most important factor bearing upon success in the motion picture business—the manufacturers, the film exchange or the exhibitor. Columns of space could be filled in properly answering this question, but in responding briefly I think the manufacturer is the most important factor. Without the manufacturer there would be no pictures; therefore, that factor is indispensable. In many parts of the world, the United States not excepted, manufacturers supply films direct to exhibitors, thereby showing that film exchanges are dispensible. In many other parts manufacturers are direct exhibitors. But the chief factor bearing upon success is one the interrogation does not embrace, that is the amusement public. In times past this was not so pronounced. Curiosity aroused by the novelty attached to the pictures practically forced the public to patronize them and at that time the manufacturer was the real factor. But things have changed. The novelty has worn and only merit counts. If it is not there the public withdraws its patronage, regardless of the identity of the manufacturer, the middle man or the exhibitor, and it cannot be disputed that the manufacturer who cannot meet the requirements of the amusement public must go to the wall.

CHOICE OF SUBJECTS.

Probably there is nothing of greater importance in picture making than the nature of the subject, the object in view is not always understood by those who are to look upon the pictures. A name or a title is of great importance, it is at least two-fold in its purpose, it is intended either to draw attention to the pictures themselves, or to the object in view of which the pictures are a "means to an end." Sometimes both of these purposes are attained, making a film of double value and therefore full of satisfaction. There can be no doubt that pictures of the latter class are those which this page can most advantageously speak of. As an illustration, "Uncle Tom's Cabin" has proved both in book and picture an all sufficient subject; its pictures please, its lessons are apparent. "The Tale of Two Cities" is another good example in its particular class.

"Herod and the New Born King" and kindred pictures satisfactorily prove themselves as pictures to please with thoughts to inspire. "Athaliah" is of the the other class, belonging only to the picturesque; the scenes may be gorgeous, the acting perfect, the pictures masterpieces of photographic art, making the whole a triumph of cinematography pleasing even to the critic as well as to the average beholder.

It does not, however, fulfill the second requirement of an educational picture in that there is no worthy purpose suggested by its production.

It would be of some assistance to many of us, if authors of subjects such as "Athaliah" would acquaint us with their object or motive. What especial interest an almost unknown historical character like this can arouse is questionable; especially for one whose only reputation lies in the fact that she was a fearful human butcher.

May we not expect a film on Jezebel now? or a Borgia series? Why delve among the hideous characters of a buried past to produce even works of art; are there not sufficient of a better and nobler kind? Surely if any subject is worthy of reproduction those having the twofold value already suggested are preferable. The world is full of them, making it unnecessary to go down into dark depths for stained lives and tainted characters. If a strong lesson of this kind must be sought, let it come from such an one as Herodias and Salome, where remorse and anguish follow the foul doing to death of John the Baptist; or a Judas suffering the anguish of a betrayer; but not a remorseless character like some of those named above.

The choice of a subject should be as important to the film maker as it is to a painter or writer, the effects of the plot should be equally important. If we have to delve in filth let us find some pearls, but do not let us have only soiled thoughts as a reward for our pains. Catchy titles are deceiving and destroy confidence on the other hand, exaggerated titles lead to disappointments and carefulness against being "caught a second time."

People always like the solid and substantial subjects: those giving them something to remember often please the most. It is interesting to note that those films fulfilling the conditions herein enumerated are the ones whose repetition is called for.

Surely then the choice of the subject is of greater importance than is often accorded, causing the writer to feel that there is room for a broadening of the applied educational faculties of those to whose not this important matter falls, to see nothing of the fact that a reputation may be made along these lines as along any other. A reputation for good subjects is equally as valuable as a reputation for good work in other respects.

LECTURE IT RIGHT, OR NOT AT ALL.

A lecturer was employed at the Pastime Theatre, Boston, Mass., to describe Pathé's "Athaliah." He was all done before the first six scenes ended and his explanations were forgotten, or else confused those in the audience who wished to understand the photoplay. The lecturer should make his description conform to the scenes or else leave it out entirely. As it was done there it was worse than nothing.

FROM DESTRUCTION TO PROTECTION.

Three years ago the then Mayor of New York at one stroke endeavored to destroy the moving picture places, by ordering their immediate closing up. While there may have been some cause for this official wrath, there was not sufficient to pronounce a final doom. Sundry little warfares have since then, from time to time, been waged against the pictures; none of them, however, have proved effective. Thanks to the good sense of the majority of those interested in good moving picture work, following the leadership of their best friends, among whom the Moving Picture World is neither last or least, the minority of inefficients have been wiped out—the weakest have "gone to the wall." There remains now a highly respected, educated coterie of moving picture places, which have proved sufficient—not only to command the respectful attention of the authorities, but of the Chief Magistrate himself.

The present Mayor of New York has appointed a commission to protect the best interests of the moving picture places, thereby recognizing the stability of this new agency of both amusement and instruction. With the silencing of opposition from without, with the cultivation of the best purpose from within, with the overshadowing watchfulness of the authorities, the moving picture interests are on the verge of their best growth. The present is the opportune moment. To those who embrace this opportunity and use it for the good purposes presented to them great profits will accrue. Upon those who abuse these privileges shunning censure shall fall, they will, however, be few and far between.

In the first city of America the moving picture has every favorable chance to "make good"; thus protected and encouraged let all having a part in this work prove equal to the occasion.

HERODIAS AND SALOME.

This new Eclair film shortly to be released is a notable production.

The chief characters of Herod, Herodias, Salome and John the Baptist are well sustained, although distinctly theatrical in conception and execution.

Without doubt the important scene where Salome dances before Herod, fulfills the intention of the makers both in brilliancy of action and surroundings.

The fiendish cunning of Herodias in persuading Salome to ask for the head of John in response to Herod's rash vow, is very cleverly portrayed, as is also Herod's terrible remorse when he realizes the result of his rashness.

Again the remorse of Salome worn alone with the love of the martyr is a fitting portrayal of the guilty conscience and its terrible agonies when face to face with its victim; the murderers of the workings of the conscience in the agony of conviction is one of the strong features of the whole.

The whole is certainly not intended to vilify Herod or St. John the Baptist, otherwise more of his life and works would have been given it is rather to expose the tissue revenge of a designing woman, whose sin be not so nationally denounced. While the acting and photographic work are creditable to the high class standing now enjoyed from the standpoint of the cinematography the effects in certain scenes could be bettered in any future production of John the Baptist that he be treated more as a solid asthetic, made bold and fearless by the knowledge of the power of the truth he is sent to proclaim rather than a cringing champion of self-sufficient proud of his convictions. Again the need be used thereof the scene of the biblical tabular if we are to be correctly portrayed.

Another Eclair film is a new series of views of Jerusalem and vicinity, with scenes of the characteristic inhabitants. With a descriptive text from the Bible to accompany each view pointing moreover, where the text and the scene of action is situated it thrown with an explanation when need be connection with biblical studies and schools, or acts a geographical nature, it promises to be a valuable addition to the list of educational films.

Los Angeles.

By Richard V. Spencer.

Selig.—Mr. MaGee, business manager of the Selig Western Company, has just returned from a week's visit to San Francisco, where he had gone on business in the interest of the company.

Pathe.—James Young Deer, the Pathe producer and member of the Pathe Company, spent several days last week photographing the mansion and grounds of M. Paul de Longpre, the famous artist, who granted the Pathe Company the exclusive right to photograph his beautiful Hollywood estate.

Bison.—Mr. Montgomery, the Bison director, who was ill several days last week, has recovered and is again at work.

Miss Virginia Chester.—Who has been seriously ill for the past month, is now able to be up and about and will again resume her work before the camera. Miss Chester has been appearing with the Pathe Company playing Ingenue parts.

Miss Bessie Eyton.—Another member of the Pathe Company has also been on the sick list for the past week.

K. W. Linn, special representatives of Pathe Freres, arrived in the city from New York on the 10th. Mr. Linn plans to remain in the city for a week during which time he will inspect the local Pathe studio. On the evening of the 10th Mr. Linn, and the members of the Pathe Stock Company, were the guests of Mr. Young Deer at the Optic Theater, where they viewed the latest Pathe Western film, "The White Skuaw." Later in the evening Mr. Linn, Mr. and Mrs. French, Fred W. Gollum and the writer were the guests of Mr. Young Deer at a local musical comedy theater. Later in the week Mr. Linn will be shown places of local interest and will watch the Pathe Company at work.

Biograph.—The Biograph Company is about to stage an expensive film of marine life. For the past week they have been hard at work in the Malibu country in preparing marine stories. They have purchased a schooner and are about to enact a real shipwreck. The schooner will be driven upon the rocks, after which life savers will get busy and rescue the crew.

Fred W. Gollum, a local actor and business man of considerable note, has joined the Pathe Company in the capacity of business manager. Mr. Gollum will also be seen in leading roles from time to time.

Margaret Ward Manners, whose photograph appears on this page, has lately joined the Pathe Company to play leading roles, and will be seen in forthcoming Pathe Western productions. Miss Manners is an accomplished actress and is well known by her work in Western legitimate stock companies.

Selig Second Company Goes North.—Mr. Bosworth, director, Miss Harte, Mr. Garcia, Mr. Huntley and Mr. Cogley have gone north to Santa Barbara to take a series of exteriors. They expect to be gone about a week.

Los Angeles Exhibitors.

Optic.—533 S. Main Street, under the management of R. W. Woodley, is now running vaudeville in addition to their programme of licensed pictures. Mr. Woodley has also added a flasher electric sign with the word "Vaudeville" visible to all parts of South Main Street within a block of the theater.

Rounder.—The Rounder has discarded their daylight screen and have gone back to the use of the curtain installed before the change.

Isis Goes Independent.—The Isis has joined the Independent ranks and is now showing four Independent reels of second run secured through Miles Brothers' Exchange. For their Independent opening bill their program contained Solax, Bison, Thanhouser and Yankee films.

Bijou.—L. M. Dull, proprietor of the Bijou, has installed a daylight curtain.

Another Hyman Enterprise.—Arthur S. Hyman, president of the Hyman circuit of vaudeville and picture theaters, is planning to spend another $150,000 in the erection of two high class theaters, one to be built in Long Beach, and the other in San Pedro. Negotiations are now in progress between Mr. Hyman and a group of Eastern capitalists who are interested in the far Western amusement field. These negotiations are said to have progressed far enough to tentatively select sites for both of the proposed new theaters. Mr. Hyman has negotiated with Col. W. J. Horne, of Long Beach, for the purchase of a lot on Ocean Avenue opposite the Salt Lake depot, owned by the latter, and valued at $50,000. If the deal is consummated Mr. Hyman will erect a $75,000 theater building. The San Pedro theater will cost approximately $50,000, exclusive of the site on which it will be built.

Alteration.—The Amusement & Realty Company, owners, are fitting up the two-story building at 128 S. Spring Street for a moving picture theater. M. A. Rowland, a local contractor, has the alteration contract which calls for an expenditure of $4,000.

Airdome.—A building permit has been issued to H. E. Scott, 1210 Westlake Avenue, owner and builder, who proposes erecting a box for a moving picture machine in the airdome at 4600 Monica Avenue.

Another.—F. M. Agostini, 147 S. Broadway, has taken out a building permit for alterations to his airdome at 1213-1217 West Washington Street. The $225 contract for the work was let to J. R. Kendall.

A Press Comment.—The Los Angeles Examiner of recent date contains the following editorial on educational films:

"The Moral Effect of the Moving Picture."

"In one respect at least moving pictures have performed a work that man has found difficult. They have converted the head hunters of the Philippines into decent citizens. Our officials in the islands were at a loss how to impress upon the savages the advantages of cleanliness until they hit upon the moving pictures. Here was an expedient that spoke all dialects and was entertaining at the same time.

"The novelty of the show appealed to the native's curiosity and then to his pride, and the result has been clean houses and streets where before there were filth and unsanitary conditions.

"Secretary Worcester dwells upon the beneficial effects to the nation of contact with the Americans. Head hunting, he says, is fast disappearing, and the Igorotes are learning to like the Americans because they realize they have in them good friends so long as they behave themselves. They would be horrified, he says, at the thought of being turned over to Filipino rule."

Church Permit Refused.—The Rev. B. H. Reutepohler, pastor of the Salem Congregational Church, has been denied a moving picture permit to show pictures in his frame church building, since to allow it would be a volation of the city ordinances. Mr. Reutepohler now proposes to evade the ordinance by a unique plan. He proposes to place the projection machine in a fireproof cage adjoining the church and project the picture through the church windows into a curtain placed within the church. J. J. Backus, chief building inspector, holds that this is still a technical violation of the ordinance. He has referred the matter to the building committee of the City Council, who will in turn consult the city attorney before announcing a decision in the matter.

Censorship Switched.—Since dropping the moving picture censorship question the City Council has turned the spotlight upon the censorship of plays presented by the local stock companies and by traveling companies. Guy Eddie, Deputy City Attorney, recently censored "The Girl From Rector's," and refused to allow the play to proceed on the ground that it was suggestive and immoral, although the play had been censored by the management and several of the original lines and costumes removed. A year ago the same play appeared locally in its original state, but drew no serious criticism. The city attorney has petitioned the City Council to form a censorship committee, and if this is done, moving pictures and exhibitors will again come into the affair.

Washington, D. C.

The Colonial is having a two weeks' run of the Passion Play, accompanied by appropriate organ music. As an aid to those attending this silent sermon, Manager Brylawski is issuing a folder explaining further the story, making Biblical references. This is the best presentation that has been made of this film and it is appropriate during the Easter season.

One of the most exclusive theaters in the northwest section is the Royal, with Wm. M. Braswell as manager. Running three good reels, with the addition of a new feature film, it maintains at all times a large patronage, which between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening amounts to standing in line for entrance. The Royal is opened only during the evening, but Manager Braswell finds this sufficient for his location in the residence section.

A talk with Manager Long, of the E. M. F. Automobile Agency, revealed the information that he will soon bring to Washington for a complimentary exhibition the film of automobiling manufacturing from the raw steel bars to the finished car. This, as recently shown in a private display before the automobile men, gives an excellent idea of the auto industry, which has become a potent factor in the world's progress of to-day. There will be explanatory remarks during the presentation of this reel.

The Howe Travel Festival has just closed a week's engagement at the Columbia Theater, one of our large first-class drama theaters. The educational benefits of this exhibition of animated views have been far reaching and endorsed by men and women of the schools and colleges. It brought history and geography to the stay-at-homes and even travel by balloon. This last was the most novel and perhaps the most enjoyed. This was the second engagement of the Howe pictures in this city during this season, which speaks well for their popularity and financial drawing powers.

Much has been said recently about cheap vaudeville in the moving picture theaters. A talk with Manager Backrach, of the Pastime and the Metropolitan, brought forth another man who had demonstrated that such a combination does not pay. "I have tried it," said Mr. Backrach, "and found I was losing money, but since I have put pictures only in that theater I have caught up with my losses." Another example of I told you so.

The most expensive film service handled in this city and within a wide territory around Washington is that at the Empress, managed by Marcus Notes. Three complete independent first day releases are run here daily and in consequence the Empress has refined patronage and always large audiences. In this respect Mr. Notes may be called a producer in the motion picture industry and his aim is to secure the most unusual attractions offered by the Independents. The recent run of several days of "The Fall of Troy" was marked by big attendance and appropriate musical setting. This last feature is one of the strong points of the manager, who uses excellent talent for his productions.

It appears that the recent visit of Buffalo Bill on the screens of the picture houses interfered with the finances of the real show when it came to Washington later.

Word has been received that Mr. and Mrs. Tom Moore, of the General Film Service in the South, stating that they are enjoying themselves.

Manager Lucas, of the Washington Film Exchange, has been making a tour in Western Pennsylvania and Ohio, with the view of studying the Independent situation in that section. During his absence Mr. Dexter and Mr. Walker have been looking after home affairs.

A real live North Dakota Indian has been visiting some of the motion picture theaters during the past two weeks. This is Thunder Bear, who created something of a sensation at the Mount Vernon and the Savoy. He is a cultured Red Man and spoke very intelligently to the various audiences he addressed. His manner of presenting souvenirs of beadwork to old and young couples in the audience was rather novel.

The Virginian, with Harry Chick as manager, ran the "Fall of Troy" for four days during Easter week. He secured the interest of the schools in this historical masterpiece and in consequence the Virginian was the resort of students during their Easter holidays. As the Fall of Troy forms a part of the history and Latin courses of our High Schools, this pictorial presentation formed excellent compliment. An interesting series of slides, recently exhibited at the Virginian, were views of the disastrous shirtwaist factory fire in New York, in which so many girls lost their lives. There will shortly be a reel on this subject, but even this individual picture made more impressive the newspaper accounts of this awful conflagration. The playing of a funeral dirge added to the solemnity.

Manager Boernstein, of the Capital Film Company, made a reel of the Easter Egg Rolling at the White House grounds on Easter Monday. On account of the large crowds, it was rather difficult to get what the picture man wants. However, we hope this turns out well, as this will make an interesting reel of how the President of the United States permits his private grounds to be turned over to childish amusements for the rising generation once a year. The Capital Film Company anticipates getting into new quarters soon, and it is possible this company will locate in the suburbs, where it will have better opportunities for its work.

The question of permitting amusement houses to be opened on Sunday is occupying the attention of District officials and men of Congress. This interests the moving picture theater managers, who should see to it that their Sunday bill as well as the display before their houses be not such as to provoke unfavorable criticism of those seeking to close all places of amusement on Sunday. There is a large uplifting and educational side to the motion picture, so let the investigators see it. By all means don't display those glaring lithographic exhibitions of distorted art on Sunday. It is distracting enough to see them during the week. Several of the moving picture houses in this city have ceased using these, displaying simply, artistically lettered billboards giving the program of the day. Other managers use the lithographs only when they are pleasing enough to the eye to be an advertisement of the photoplay.

The Dixie, the largest motion picture house in the northeast section of the city, is also one of the most select. With a seating capacity of four hundred, Manager Eastman still finds he has an overflow audience between 8 and 9 o'clock. In an interview with the manager he said: "Remembering that the public is my main stay, it is my wish to gain its good will and not its disfavor. If more managers would realize this, there would not be so much friction. Now when the 'Tale of Two Cities' was at my house, the principal of the nearby school told me that if I ran those reels exclusively, she would recommend it to the students. Accordingly I complied with her request. On Palm Sunday I arranged a program of religious films; had an excellent boy soprano sing 'The Palms,' using violin and piano as the musical accompaniment. Another thing you will notice is that I never use those unsightly lithographs, but instead two large seat-lettered billboards. These cost me far more than the lithographs, but they amply repay me in the refined patronage I receive and the tone of culture they give to my house."

The furore which the presentation of the Jesse James film excited appeared to be "more smoke than fire." It seems that the greatest objection was to the displaying of the posters, said to be in violation to the police regulations, which forbids the exhibiting of pictures of crimes in or near all well conducted places. Some arrests of managers were made, but they got off.

One man said that the Jesse James outlaw adventures were now a matter of history, but the authorities feared that it would be difficult to measure the adventurous exploits of that. One manager cited in his defense that the train robbers picture, to which great objection was made, was of the same character as the holdups of the stage coach displayed in the shows of Buffalo Bill. The court was forced to admit this.

It was further advanced that if the reel had been called something else instead of the glaring title introducing the name of the famous outlaw, the matter would have passed unnoticed. Anyway, the film was no sooner, which has ceased the wear of time.

One manager remarked that the surveillance of the police had the good effect of keeping the undesirable element from his theater allowing comfort for his more refined patrons.

Boston.

Report of the Committee on Picture Houses.

The committee to inquire conditions in Boston moving picture houses, in its report submitted on Friday, April 14, to Mayor Fitzgerald, states as its conclusions, after a study of the matter, that signs and all other obstructive objects should be removed from theater entrances and passageways; that the fire risk may be diminished by more exits and more fireproof construction for the future picture houses. That an effective system of ventilation be enforced. That the managers should be assisted in securing a better grade of vaudeville entertainment, or that a commission be appointed to control and regulate these show houses. The report stated further, that almost without exception, the Boston moving picture theaters are made over from old stores located in inflammable and poorly constructed buildings, and that the extreme fire risks and lack of proper ventilation are obvious, even to the most uninformed. The report goes on to say that the development of the moving picture business has latterly been accomplished by posters issued by the film manufacturers. These posters are, as a rule, sensational, misleading, crudely colored. The report states that the alluring scenes in the posters seldom bear sufficient relation to the story of the film itself, and particularly in the use made of them by the moving picture managers, have come to be not only offensive, but positively harmful to the safety of the patrons of these theaters. The committee also reported that, added to the fire risk imposed upon the auditorium by the flimsy and poor construction of the building in which it is so generally situated, and the dangerous nature of the material employed, the matter of maintaining a proper exit space for the audiences has come to be disregarded. That, in a great number of these theaters, the exit —originally planned to be merely of the smallest possible area allowed by the building department—have gradually been taken up by the erection of ticket booths, and by the placing of permanent or movable signs and billboards. These obstructions, it is alleged, do cover the exits and are so dangerous that they impede egress even under normal conditions. In the case of a panic, with a dozen or more billboards of varying sizes, these, once overturned, would be the means of causing much damage and injury. The principal objections to the moving picture theaters, as they are at present conducted and operated, arise from the necessarily cheap class of vaudeville the managers have added to their programs. The committee reports that the improvements in the films themselves, and in the subjects portrayed have been overbalanced by the vulgar vaudeville. The committee feel that the managers have added the vaudeville to compete with the larger vaudeville houses, and that the people who go to see the pictures do not necessarily demand the vaudeville. The committee recommended that the system in regard to moving picture theaters as approved by Chicago be put into vogue in Boston. To summarize, the committee desire the following changes made: the removal of all obstructive signs from the lobbies; better exits and more fireproof construction; that the vaudeville be made to conform to a higher standard.

The foregoing is a resume of the report as it appeared in the papers of Boston. The report was much more complete. Each moving picture theater in Boston was described, with its name given, together with the faults as found by the committee. The committee making this report are as follows: Mary Crawford, Frank C. Brown, E. T. Hartman, Richard Nerstadt, W. F. Macy, R. A. Woods, Myer Bloomfield, E. S. Forbes, E. D. Curran, and a few others. The Twentieth Century Club of Boston, together with the South End House, submitted the report, and the above mentioned are also members of these organizations.

The World's New England representative spoke with one of the members of the committee, and found that this member agreed that there were some mistakes in the report, which had no doubt crept in from insufficient information. It hardly seems like "uplift" to offer a report to the local authorities of this kind—which condemned in some respects nearly every house—knowing that this report contained misinformation. The member interviewed remarked that, in his portion of the investigation, he had found only two vaudeville acts that were suggestive. Yes, there were several theaters in Boston, not devoted to the exhibition of photoplays, whose faults greatly overshadowed those of picture houses. When asked why the committee had not first devoted its energies to the "uplift" (?) of these houses, we were amazed to hear, "We'd be glad to, only we are powerless with them."

The writer admits he was dumbfounded at such a reply and no doubt the readers of the World will be likewise. However, against these educational and settlement organizations no whispers of graft, or anything of that kind can be made. Therefore, the report mentioned above—a mixture of truths and errors—can be dismissed with the statement that it was an honest effort of some misguided people, with no real experience, who endeavor to "uplift," while, in reality, they tear down. The report is at present in the hands of Mayor Fitzgerald and License Clerk Casey. No action has been taken at the present writing. In these columns next week there may appear some further notice as to this matter. It is hinted that some of the local city authorities in charge of the Boston moving picture theaters do not agree with certain points in the report regarding the alleged defects in certain of the houses, and that the matter will be taken up with the committee who made the report.

HENRY.

New England.

The Auditorium on Chap Street, New Haven, is being remodeled and expects to be open about April 15, with vaudeville and pictures. It is a beautiful place, seating nearly 1,000. Mr. Miller, of Poli's Theater, will have the management. Plans are being filed for a handsome theater on the site of the burned Poli Theater on Church Street.

The Pastime Theater in Ansonia is drawing large crowds. Mr. Clarkson, the owner of this theater, is giving it his personal attention.

Mr. Fred V. Green, Jr., of Brooklyn, N. Y., has leased the Lockwood Hall in Norwalk and will run pictures and songs. This place will be opened about April 20th.

The Comet Theater, in Bridgeport, has closed its doors on account of poor business. Mr. Skidmore, of the Imperial Theater, is building an Airdrome adjoining his theater. "Happy" Bill Smith, of the Bijou, says he is done with "pop" vaudeville, and will run straight pictures hereafter. Mr. George Standen, the popular music composer, has bought the Happy Hour Theater on State Street, and has extensive plans made for the airdome, which he says will be the finest in the State. Dennis Kelly has again opened a theater on State Street. This makes three within one block. Kimberly & MacIntyre, of the Derby, have failed, and it is being run at present by the sheriff's orders.

Meriden, Conn., will soon possess a strictly first-class theater devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville, if the present plans of Messrs. Pindar and Rudloff, of Meriden, are realized. These men are intending to build their new house upon the site of the old Meriden Opera House, which was razed to the ground by fire several years ago. There are few towns in Connecticut more suited to the successful operating of a large, first-class moving picture theater than is Meriden, as this city is not overcrowded at all in this respect.

Mr. William P. Gray, of the Mystic Theater, Lewiston, Maine, is sponsor for the statement that his cozy theater is doing an excellent business, due to the use of good pictures and illustrated songs.

The World's New England representative has had the pleasure of seeing the brochure issued by the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company. If the truth be known, he was amazed at the beauty of this booklet. It is no doubt the most artistic and expensive booklet of its kind issued by any concern in this business. Exhibitors who wish to keep themselves informed as to the plans of this company are advised to write for its advertising matter.

Manager John F. Adams, of the Colonial Theater, Lawrence, Mass., closed his house during the week of April 10. The house reopened the following Monday.

Manager James S. Fitch, of the Park Theater, Taunton, Mass., closed his house for Holy Week. The Casino, also of Taunton, was dark on that week.

The Legislature of Rhode Island has before its consideration bills with a view to changing conditions now existant regarding standing patrons in theaters. The bills, if enacted, will forbid overcrowding in the standing room and lobbies of theaters. Taking the bill by the horns was the course adopted by the newly formed Theatrical Managers' Protective Association of Providence, when this body voted of its own accord to restrict standing room, except to a very limited degree. This course will tend to lessen fire risks, and is a step in the right direction. The World's New England representative has already made detailed mention of this new association in these columns, and praised both the association itself and the officers elected by the body. Their good work has already been felt, as it has been voted that the theaters making up the association should exercise a censorship over themselves. The idea of this body is to elevate the performances, to run clean, orderly houses and, in a word, to encourage advancement. The only real uplift to the moving picture theaters will come from such sources as this—where the "uplifters" are the proprietors and managers themselves, not from the muck-raking of so-called educational institutions which condemn everything and everybody in toto, without exact knowledge or experience.

It is rumored that the Comique Theater, Lynn, Mass., will drop vaudeville from its bills and, in its place, will offer "talking pictures," by a lecturer. In addition, illustrated songs will be used. Mr. Moe Mark is operating his house successfully, and is getting his share of the Lynn trade.

The large Nickle Theater of Portland, Maine, has had a successful opening, and Mr. William O. Johnson has been installed as manager.

Manager Royce, of the Casino Theater, Providence, R. I., played the Passion Play pictures in Holy Week. These reels overcame the usual slackness on that week.

On Sunday evening, April 16, the Jolliette Theater, Boston, gave its annual presentation of the Passion Play. The reels were exhibited throughout that week. This presentation of the Passion Play is the fifth showing of the reels in the Jolliette. On two occasions the pictures were exhibited for two full weeks, and the remaining exhibitions were for one week each. Manager Roth reports that these weeks have witnessed some of the biggest totals ever recorded by the house; conclusively showing that such beautiful subjects never grow stale with the people. The house had 13,000 "fliers" printed, 8,000 of which were in Italian. These programs gave the synopsis of the thirty-nine scenes in the pictures. HENRY.

In the Mississippi Valley.

T. C. German, of Springfield, Ill., who has been operating a moving picture show in the opera house at Athens, Ill., has leased a first-floor suite in the Bruseke Building in that city and opened the Gem Theater, on April 15. The building is fireproof throughout and has a seating capacity of 250.

Moving pictures of life in Minneapolis, Minn., are to be shown at land shows in moving picture theaters, and elsewhere throughout the United States and Europe, if proper arrangements can be made with the Great Northern Road by the Minneapolis Commercial Club; in this work the Publicity Bureau will cooperate.

Commissioner W. G. Nye, of the public affairs committee, will investigate a project that the Great Northern Railway has under way. One of the features of this will be an "All-American" tour, starting at New York and going to the Pacific Coast. There will be shown scenes on the Great Lakes to Duluth on Lake Superior, and take in the agricultural and scenic features seen along the Great Northern Railway from the twin cities westward. Glacier National Park will be featured. In fact, about one-half of all the scenes will be used to exploit this tour.

The cities along the Great Northern have been given opportunity to participate, and several have indicated their intention of having "stories" of from 500 to 1,500 feet made to show local advantages. Everett, Washington, was the first to come in, with a telegram ordering 500 feet. Portland will probably take 2,000 feet and Seattle 1,000, and Minneapolis possibly as much as Seattle.

E. W. Brown, of Springfield, Ill., has accepted a position with the American Film Company, of St. Louis, Mo.

O. B. Bratcher and Frank Tarbutton have purchased the moving picture show at Hillsboro, Tex., which recently has been operated by the Third Regimental Band, Texas National Guard, and will install it in the former Y. M. C. A. Building, which has been remodeled into an airdome for summer use. Before winter it will be again remodeled for a permanent home for photoplay.

Harvey Bryner, of Galesburg, Ill., a moving picture operator, and Miss Grace Doenges, of Springfield, Ill., were married April 9 in Springfield.

R. T. Ash, Aledo, Ill., has reopened the South Side Theater in that city after expending $1,000 in improvements for a suitable place for photoplay exhibitions.

An airdome to be used for picture shows is being constructed at Morgan and First Streets, Shelbyville, Ill.

The Gem Theater Company, of Cairo, Ill., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000 to conduct a moving picture and vaudeville show. The incorporators are Augustus Botts, M. Meyers and Alexander Wilson.

John Jordan and Christ Jensen have purchased from J. B. Jorden, the Electric Theater, Mason Avenue, Dwight, Ill.

The New Majestic Theater, Danville, Ill., a photoplay house, has been remodeled.

The Springfield, Ill., Federation of Labor has taken up the matter of non-union musicians in moving picture theaters and a grievance committee has been appointed to investigate conditions.

The Stone Motion Picture Company, of Salpulpa, Okla., has been chartered in Oklahoma to show pictures of the Morris-Schreck fight. The capital is $5,000 and the directors are W. F. Stone, C. B. Burnett and C. W. Willis, all of Sapulpa.

The value of the well-lighted moving picture theater in attracting crowds to certain streets has been the subject of much study by the Denver Gas & Electric Company, of Denver, Col. Statistics gathered are reproduced in a recent number of the Western Electrician, of Chicago, in an article by Joseph A. McMeel. Illustrations are made of the Iris and Isis photoplay houses, two pleasing examples. The article says in part:

"In regard to the lights being responsible for the enormous night traffic in this vicinity, an idea of its extensiveness might be gleaned from the count taken by the Denver Gas & Electric Company in October, 1909, which shows the pedestrian travel on this street to be the heaviest in the city. The count indicated the number of people on foot, the number of street car passengers, the number of vehicle passengers, including those on bicycle, and the number of street cars and vehicles, and is substantially correct.

The first mentioned count—that of the pedestrians on foot—is the only one that has any real bearing on the attendance at these two theaters, assuming that only a small percentage of the vehicle and street car passengers stop along this thoroughfare. The total number of people passing Sixteenth and Curtis Streets the day the count was 96,643. East of Sixteenth Street in the immediate vicinity of the two theaters in question the exact number of people was 16,900. Here it might be cited, however, that some of the people coming into Curtis Street from Seventeenth and Eighteenth Streets, but not proceeding as far west as the counters, stationed at Sixteenth and Curtis Streets, were not included in the recapitulation. A conservative estimate of this number might be taken at about 6,000 people. This number makes a total of 22,900 people directly in the path of the attractive light from these theater fronts.

Similar statistics were taken in other down-town sections of Denver, but almost all were taken in districts illuminated on a smaller scale and, as might be surmised, the pedestrian traveled in every instance was much lighter. The enumerations were taken on different nights and at times when just the ordinary street crowds were about. This, therefore, certifies that this same average holds good throughout the year..

Philadelphia Exchange Notes.

The Moving Picture Co. of America will open a new place on 1018 Market Street about the 1st of May, seating 900.

Another place by the same concern will be opened during the latter part of May on 333 Market Street, seating about 1,000, and at an approximate cost of $45,000. Pictures and vaudeville.

The Philadelphia Film Exchange has removed to new and spacious quarters at 121 N. 9th Street.

Everything is moving round Philadelphia; so is Tom Bible. Tom wears a smile that won't come off and says the business is great. The Universal Film Exchange will get in the swim and move to a more central location at 934 Arch Street.

The General Film Co. is also switching around and made a few changes of late. There was great activity at the headquarters at 926 Market Street. Mr. Harry Schwalbee is the general manager for the General Film Co. in Philadelphia, and Mr. Saunders, formerly of Pittsburgh Calcium Light, of Pittsburgh and Rochester, assistant manager. Mr. Schwalbee is running the Calehuff branch, Mr. Saunders the Lubin branch and Mr. Van Gordon, formerly of the B. & W., of Baltimore, the Electric Theater branch.

Mr. Moyer, of the Exhibitors' Film Service Co., is another man that doesn't complain about the business. If you wish to see a nice office and an up-to-date system, kindly step inside and have a talk with Mr. Moyer.

CLEAN FILMS.

We understand the Mortimer Film Cleaning Device is having a ready sale and is giving satisfaction wherever the exchanges are using the little machine extensively, some putting in a half-dozen for their own accessday use. Clean films mean better pictures, consequently greater satisfaction between exchangemen and exhibitors and between the exhibitor and his patrons. As the machine can be adjusted to do its work at the same time the reel is being rewound, exhibitors are also using them in goodly numbers to ensure clean runs on every film in their program by cleaning the reel every time it is rewound.

Draft of By-laws of the Exhibitors' League of New York.

(Exhibitors in other cities are advised to file this set of by-laws for possible future use.)

EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF GREATER N. Y.

Report of Committee on By-Laws.

The committee on by-laws of the Exhibitors' League of Greater New York begs to make the following report:

A rough draft of proposed set of by-laws is herewith submitted. The committee is by no means satisfied that these by laws will cover all of the needs of the league. The scope of its work should be broad and comprehensive so as to achieve actual practical results for the members, and to judiciously safeguard their interests so that their legitimate business may be run upon legitimate business lines without fear of unjust prosecution or persecution. The committee has no doubt that there will be differences of opinion upon the merit of some of the sections of the proposed by-laws, and in fact, invite such criticism, for only by comparison of views of all the members will the best set of by-laws be adopted.

The following are the proposed set of by laws:

ARTICLE I.

This league shall be known and styled by the name of the Exhibitors' League of Greater New York.

ARTICLE II.

Membership and Voting.

Sec. 1.—The members of this league shall be the Incorporators and such other persons as shall become members in accordance with this article.

Every legitimate exhibitor of moving pictures, maintaining a regular public place of amusement anywhere in Greater New York where moving pictures form the sole or important part of the program of entertainment at such public place of exhibition, and where an admission fee is charged to view such exhibition, shall be eligible to membership in this organization, and may be admitted to the same by a majority vote of those present at any regular monthly meeting, upon compliance with Article 2, Sec. 2, Article 5, Sec. 3, Article 7, Sec. 3 of these by-laws having been previously complied with.

Sec. 2.—The term member used in this article shall include any exhibitor, individual, partnership, co-partnership, corporation or joint stock company. The members of a co-partnership, the officer of a corporation or joint stock company shall not both participate in discussion at meeting, but each co-partnership, corporation or joint stock company to be given one voting member only, and another partner or officer may vote in his absence in accordance and in the order of the designations for that purpose filed with the league.

Sec. 3.—If a member at any time shall for a period of one year, fail to maintain a regular public place of amusement in which moving pictures, where moving pictures form the sole or important part of the program of entertainment at such public place of exhibition and where an admission fee is charged to view such exhibition, he shall be subject to be suspended from and shall forfeit all the requirements of membership, or shall be suspended from membership, as a majority of the members vote at a meeting called for the purpose of considering his case. He shall receive a written notice to be present at such meeting and shall be entitled to be heard in his defence. Charges must be served on him ten days before such meeting.

ARTICLE III.

Meetings.

Sec. 1.—The annual meeting of members for the election of officers for the ensuing year and for such other business as may properly come before the meeting, shall be held at 12 o'clock on the first Thursday of April in each year. Should such day for any reason be a legal holiday then such meeting shall be held on the following Thursday not a legal holiday.

The secretary shall send through the post office at least five days before such meeting a notice thereof, addressed to each member by his known post-office address, and shall also publish a notice thereof in the editions of the recognized prominent trade papers preceding the date of such meeting. A quarter of the members in good standing must be present at such meeting to constitute a quorum. In case a quorum shall not be present at such meeting, a majority of those present may adjourn the meeting to some future time, not less than seven or more than fourteen days later, and the secretary shall thereupon give notice of such adjourned meeting to each member as hereinbefore provided.

Sec. 2.—Monthly meetings shall be held on the first Thursday of each month at 1 o'clock. Twenty members shall constitute a quorum at all meetings except the annual meeting.

Sec. 3.—Special Meetings. Special meetings may be called at any time upon the request of twenty members in good standing upon two days' notice. Such notice must contain a statement of the business to be transacted at such meeting and to be sent through the post office addressed to each member at his last known post office address.

The Board of Directors shall also on a like manner call a special meeting of members at the written request of a majority of such Boards.

No business other than that specified in the call of the meeting shall be transacted in any special meeting of members.

Sec. 4.—Voting.—At all meetings of members and in all elections every member shall be entitled to cast one vote for each house operated by him, them or it and for which it pays dues.

Sec. 5.—Order of Business. At all meetings of members the following order of business shall be observed as far as consistent with the purpose of the meeting, viz.:

1. Call of roll.
2. Report of proper notice of meeting
3. Reading minutes of previous meeting, and action thereon and reading minutes of meetings not finally disposed of.
4. Report of President.
5. Report of Secretary.
6. Report of Treasurer.
7. Report of committees, if any.
8. Proposal and election of members.
9. Reading list of members in arrears and disposing of same.
10. Election of officers at the annual meeting or filling vacancies at any proper meeting.
11. Unfinished business.
12. New business.
13. Welfare of the League.

ARTICLE IV.

Officers and Their Duties.

Sec. 1.—The officers of the league shall consist of a president, a vice-president, recording secretary, financial secretary, treasurer, sergeant-at-arms, counsel, a publicity promoter, who with the exception of the publicity promoter and sergeant-at-arms, together with eight of the other members of the league chosen for that purpose at the annual meeting as hereinafter specified, shall constitute the Board of Directors whose terms of office shall be one year or until a successor shall duly qualify.

Sec. 2.—All except the counsel shall be elected by secret ballot. A candidate must receive a majority of votes cast. The counsel shall be chosen by the Board of Directors, who shall make an agreement with him in writing, so as to explicitly state the terms of his retainer.

Sec. 3.—Vacancies.—Vacancies in any office may be filled by election at the next regular monthly meeting, or any subsequent meeting, following the creation of such vacancy, unless a previous notice of said election shall have been sent out at least two weeks in advance of such meeting.

Sec. 4.—The duties of the president, vice-president, recording and financial secretaries, sergeant-at-arms, treasurer, publicity promoter and treasurer shall be such as ordinarily pertain to the offices held by each of them.

Sec. 5.—The duties of the counsel shall be to give any member of the league in good standing, without charge to such member, advice upon any matter relating to the conduct of his said theater where there shall be any conflict between him and the municipal authorities, or in any way relating to his right to keep his business open at all reasonable hours for admission of any persons therein, or maintenance of his equipment and paraphernalia and any other matters in the conduct of his business over which the said authorities have jurisdiction. He shall also generally act as counsel to the league.

For the present it has been decided to hold a meeting every week on Thursday.

and give it advice on any legal matter it may have, and he shall appear, if necessary, and appear before any public officer, officers, board, committee or any other person wherever necessary, anywhere in the State of New York to represent the interests of this league in matters of proposed legislation that may effect the interests of the exhibitors. He shall appear and act as counsel for the league and prosecute and defend any legal matters that it may be a party to.

Sec. 6.—No officer shall get any compensation unless specifically agreed upon.

Sec. 7.—The Board of Directors shall meet at least once a month at a time and place fixed by them. Other special meetings may be held at the request of any seven directors.

ARTICLE V.

Committees.

At the annual meeting, or within ten days thereafter, the newly elected President shall appoint the following committees of three members each, to hold office for the period of one year or until their commission is terminated by resignation or revocation.

1.—An auditing committee of five, who shall examine and approve of bills before payment, shall have access to all books at all times and shall carefully examine said books and all vouchers previous to the annual meeting.

2.—A house committee of five, which shall provide for the proper equipment and maintenance of the rooms of the league, shall secure suitable quarters for the holding of the annual and monthly meetings, also a room or rooms for the Board of Directors and the various committees of this league, the employment of such attendants as may be authorized by the league. The committee shall make the rules for the use of the rooms.

3.—A membership committee of five, which shall scrutinize and report on the advisability of the admission of any applicant for admission to this league or restoration to membership. It shall also be the duty of the membership committee to keep a list of the names and addresses of exhibitors in the State of New York so far as they may know of the same, whether the said exhibitors are or are not members of this league.

4.—A committee on arbitration and grievances of five, whose findings shall be advisory only, and intended to bring moral pressure to bear on those members or non-members who may fall short of the high ethical standard of this league.

5.—The president, vice-president and attorney shall constitute a Legal Committee and Committee on Legislation for the purpose of watching court decisions, of examining any new law or proposed amendment to the laws of the state which may be prejudicial to the interest of exhibitors. The introduction of any law, its progress or passage in any house, an appointment for a hearing before any legislative committee, Mayor, Governor or officer, shall constitute an emergency, in which the President, acting on the advice of this committee, shall summon a special meeting of the league or Board of Directors, without any of the limitations of time and place mentioned elsewhere in these by-laws.

ARTICLE VI.

The seal of the league shall be in the custody of the recording secretary. Its emblem shall be such as the league may determine upon.

ARTICLE VII.

Fees, Dues and Suspensions.

Sec. 1.—The Initiation fee shall be five dollars, on behalf of which amount a receipt for membership. No initiation fee will be charged until after the league has 150 members.

Sec. 2.—The dues shall be $1.00 a month, payable monthly in advance.

Sec. 3.—No member shall be entitled to vote at the annual meeting who is in arrears for dues at the time of such meeting, nor shall such member be eligible to office or entitled to any benefits at the time of such league.

Sec. 4.—A member may be expelled by a majority vote of those present at a special meeting called for that purpose for any cause deemed satisfactory. Complainant against him must be in writing and a copy of same must be served upon him at least ten days before such meeting.

Sec. 5.—Any member remaining in arrears for dues, may be expelled at any meeting by a majority vote. (He shall first receive ten days notice in writing of opportunity to pay up his indebtedness to the league.)

ARTICLE VIII.

Benefits.

Sec. 1.—A member shall be entitled to the support of the league in any way that the members deem advisable, and shall also be entitled to the advice of counsel as per Article 4, Sec. 5.

Sec. 2.—Members shall be entitled to receive a card upon the payment of their dues each month. Receipt for dues must be signed by the financial secretary upon each card. Admission to the meetings and to the benefits of the member has a card, showing that he is in good standing. Every member in good standing shall also be entitled to a certificate, which may be hung up in his box office, which shall be in the following form: "This is to certify that the management of this theater is a member in good standing in Exhibitors' League of Greater New York," which is to be signed and sealed by the president and financial secretary.

ARTICLE IX.

Amendments.

Notice to amend these by-laws may be given at any meeting. Such notice to be handed to the secretary must be given in writing, signed by the proposer of the amendment, and at least two other members. The Board of Directors shall consider the amendment at the next regular monthly meeting.

The Board of Directors shall make their report upon such proposed amendment at the meeting after such proposal is introduced, but such report shall be advisory only. Such report and proposal shall be again read at the meeting following its introduction, such meeting following the introduction of a proposed amendment shall be a special meeting and shall be called as such special meeting for the purpose of acting upon such amendment, but the failure of the Board of Directors to [illegible] not be a bar to vote thereon.

No amendment shall be passed unless three-quarters of those voting, shall vote in favor thereof.

FIREPROOF BUILDINGS FOR STORAGE OR MANUFACTURE.

We have mentioned the Bush Terminal Buildings in these columns before and do so again, as the information may prove of value to some of our readers. A test as to the fireproof nature of these modern structures was conducted last week by Fire Commissioner Arthur O'Keefe and a committee from the New York Fire Department. A test fire was started in one of the buildings on Thirty-sixth Street, Brooklyn, in a large pile of combustibles, consisting of fillings, excelsior and rubbish collected for the purpose. In forty-two seconds after the fire was started, the automatic sprinklers (with which the buildings are supplied) with a Dual Water system, automatically responded and a flood of water quickly quenched the flames. The Bush Terminal Buildings are available for use for manufacturing purposes as well as for the storage of valuable merchandise, and the location is eminently suitable for various lines of moving picture work.

GRAND OPERA PLAYS

H. H. Duluth, Minn., asks where he can procure films of grand opera plays or standard plays of any sort.

Pathe Freres recently issued an elaborate representation of "Il Trovatore," with special music. Other standard plays have been filmed by Pathe Freres, also by Edison and the Vitagraph. These can be purchased from the manufacturer for private use or leased from any General Film Company rental office for entertainment purposes.

Practical Perfection in Projection.—Last Sunday eve the Editor visited the Loft Theater, 1828 Amsterdam Avenue, near 190th Street, and was there almost hypnotized at the results of Jack Tonkins at work on the screen. During the short visit, there was a Pathe and a Gaumont film run and but for the figures moving it might have been a stereopticon picture. The eye could hardly detect a movement of the picture on the screen. It was as though it were painted on the wall. There was absolutely no flicker at all, and as a whole the performance was practically perfect. Jack Tonkins, the operator, deserves heartiest congratulations on his work. The light was from 60 cycle A. C. and was perfectly handled as well as brilliant. Please understand that this is not a "puff." I merely set forth what I saw. Mr. Charles Letts, owner and manager of the Loft Theater, has performed wonders himself. Up two flights of stairs, with no front lights except one arc, no front advertising other than two small easel posters, in a big undecorated barn of a room, with no music but a piano, no songs, illustrated or otherwise—nothing but moving pictures, and only four reels at that, charging ten cents admission, in competition with four other nearby theaters at street level, having lighted fronts and longer, more varied programmes (some of them 5 cents admission) his house is crowded. What is the answer? Look at his projection and decide. Of course Mr. Letts is also careful in the selection of his programmes and is a thoroughly competent and capable manager, which in itself is a big factor for success. His re-winding room and workshop is a curiosity. It is about 250 feet long by 25 wide. It is but fair to add that the projection equipment consisted of a Powers No. 6 and a Rabbit's Foot Transformer with the lamp set at an angle.

Series of Lessons.—Beginning with this number, the editor of this Department proposes presenting a series of lessons on light. He fully realizes that this is a very large subject and one exceedingly difficult to handle. There is, perhaps, no other one subject in all the realm of science about which there is less general knowledge, or more mystery, than the energy surrounding us and flooding all space, to which we give the name "light." Those who propose following this series of lessons through are invited to study the subject carefully and exhaustively from the very beginning. We shall begin with the source of light and carry the subject as consistently as may be through to the action of light through lenses, including the action of light in reflection and refraction. In the beginning there may be a great deal of rather dry and, to the average operator, rather uninteresting matter. If, however, he is to arrive at a comprehensive knowledge of the action of light through lenses and the action of light in general as applied to projection, it will be necessary that he study the subject from beginning to end. The editor of this Department has been more than a year preparing for the writing of this series of articles. He has searched libraries and bookstores day after day, in the endeavor to find textbooks in which the subject of light is treated in a manner which could be understood by any one else than a professor of physics. He will not attempt to go into the matter with sufficient thoroughness to cover all sources of light and all light action, confining himself largely to that which seems to be of value in giving the operator a comprehensive knowledge of the force he is handling. This work may contain minor errors, but in the main, however, it will be found correct. On this particular subject books which the layman can readily understand are scarce. Each week after the first installment questions will be printed concerning the previous week's lesson. If there are sufficient numbers who wish to contribute, let us say $1, towards the expense of postage, stenographer's service, etc., the editor will undertake to permit answers to these questions to be sent in by mail and to return the same corrected. I do not know whether this would be practical or not, and it would probably cost those taking advantage of this feature something like $1 per month during the time the articles shall run. There would have to be quite a number accepting the proposition in order to make it feasible at all. Those of you who would like to take advantage of this feature will kindly immediately forward name, full address and $1. If sufficient response is had to this to make it practical, all right; if not, the money will be returned. Understand, this latter proposition has nothing to do with the articles themselves. It merely has to do with my correcting the question papers by mail. On an average one will be given each week probably not exceeding a page of the paper, the desire being that ample time shall be given the reader to study the subject with thoroughness. And now, having thus made a proper and correct bow, we will proceed to answer the question.

WHAT IS LIGHT?

First and foremost it will be well that the student come to an understanding, so far as possible, as to the nature of light itself and whence it emanates. In this we shall not consider light from chemical sources or do more than endeavor, as best we may, to discover the why and wherefore of light emanating from combustion.

Light may be described as the sensation of sight, or the phenomenon directly responsible for the sensation we have designated by the appellation "vision." If we enter the depths of a mine, in which there is no phosphorescent action (chemical light), there is no vision. The optic nerve receives no impression at all. Only the senses of smell, taste, hearing and feeling remain, the fifth sense being for the time obliterated. Strike a match, turn on an electric globe, or in some manner produce a certain radiant energy called "light," and instantly vision is restored, as though by magic. The flame of the match, the glowing filament of the incandescent globe, or other things having like effect, is source of a factor necessary to vision. That factor we designate as "light."

At this point let us, before going further, consider what produces luminosity (light) in ordinary combustion. In combustion it is found that oxygen from the air combines with a mixture or compound of carbon and hydrogen, the product being heat and light. The gaseous products of combustion are for the most part water vapor and carbon dioxide (carbonic acid). When an ordinary tallow candle is lighted the tallow is first heated, sucked up the wick by capillary attraction and, by the heat of the flame converted into gas. Examination of the flame will show it to be made up as per Fig. 1.

The dark portion of the flame (A) is made up of gas, which is in itself combustible, without further chemical change, as may be demonstrated by inserting a small, hollow tube into the dark portion of the flame, inclining the tube slightly upward. It will be found that on applying a match to the upper end of the tube you will have a miniature gaslight. The tube must be very small, of course, as the quantity of gas is limited. At the outer edge of the dark body of gas, oxygen from the air combines with hydrogen from the gaseous compound. This chemical action produces intense heat while at the same time it sets free particles of carbon which the heat renders incandescent, thus producing the luminous part of the flame (B). These particles of hot carbon pass outward and combine with oxygen in the transparent portion of the blaze (C), carbon dioxide (carbonic acid gas) being formed. From this we learn that it is carbon which renders the flame of the candle luminous. The same is true of the oil lamp or gas light or of any combustion producing light. In proof it will be found by taking an alcohol lamp into a dark room that practically no illumination is produced, carbon being almost entirely lacking in the flame. Sprinkle fine charcoal, coke or iron filings on the blaze and instantly it becomes luminous. In the electric arc it is the intense incandescence of the carbon particles which causes luminosity, the carbon being volatilized, while in the incandescent globe the same is true, except that the carbon, being in vacuum, is unconsumed. Thus we see that, in combustion, carbon and luminosity are inseparably linked together.

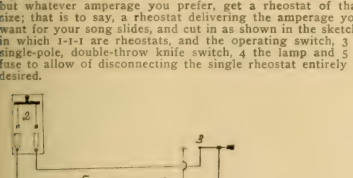
Changing Amperage.—Des Moines, Ia., writes: "I am having lots of trouble breaking song slides. We use heavy amperage for projecting moving pictures and then when we change over to the song slides the light is so powerful that the slides break very frequently. Is there any way by which I can cut down the amperage without causing a delay. I use two 25 ampere 110 volt rheostats in multiple, which I figure gives me about 45 amperes, as these machines have been used for quite a while."

Yes, the matter is very simple, Des Moines. Fifteen to eighteen amperes ought to be plenty for your song slides, but whatever amperage you prefer, get a rheostat of that size; that is to say, a rheostat delivering the amperage you want for your song slides, and cut in as shown in the sketch, in which 1-1-1 are rheostats, and the operating switch, 3 a single-pole, double-throw knife switch, 4 the lamp and 5 a fuse to allow of disconnecting the single rheostat entirely if desired.



When you get through running your picture all you have to do is flip over the single-pole double-throw switch, which has the effect of cutting out the multiple connection, substituting the single rheostat, or vice versa. This is a connection which should be installed on every projection circuit where heavy amperage is used and the song slides run with the moving picture lamp. It is like the colored gentleman whitewashing: the matter is very simple, when you "know how."

New Rules.—The writer is informed by the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, of the City of New York, that the following changes in rules went into effect April 1, namely:

"Rule 65-A-b. Add the following sentence at the end of the paragraph:

Reactance coils, motor generators and similar substitutes for resistance coils must be considered as part of the moving picture machines, and their location must receive the approval of this Department before installation.

"Add a new paragraph, to be known as 65-A-j:

The leads to the moving picture machine and its rheostat or equivalent device must be protected by a plug cutout or by a knife blade switch with open link fuses, both enclosed in an approved cabinet with self closing door. Cartridge fuses will not be permitted."

Both of the above changes are the outcome of a conference which our engineers had with the manufacturers of moving picture apparatus, and the intention is to permit the management to determine whether or not it is desired to use more or less than 30 amperes, and to wire accordingly.

Likes The World.—Mr. W. J. Cowan, Jr., Kansas City, Kan., writes from Gainesville, Tex.: "I have been very much benefited by the Trouble Department. Have been operating three years, but am at present playing in a traveling concert band. Enclosed please find $1.50 for the Handbook."

Glad to know that you are pleased with the Department, neighbor Cowan, and trust you will like the Handbook equally well.

More Data Needed.—Richmond, Va., writes: "As one of the readers of the Department who takes great interest in the various ideas, etc., therein presented, I would like to ask you the following question: I do not get the light on my picture I ought to get. The picture is very dark. I am using 235 volt current, pulling 40 amperes per electra carbons, one soft on top and a hard one below. My throw is 110 feet. I cut out two coils in my rheostat the other day, but that doesn't seem to help much."

Your data, Richmond, is altogether too scanty to allow me to give you an intelligent answer. Please come across with more information, namely: How do you know you are using 40 amperes? What kind of a rheostat are you using? How do you know the voltage is 235, that being a very unusual pressure? Is the current A. C. or D. C.? I presume D. C. from the fact that you are using one hard carbon. What is the width of your picture and any other data you may think will be of use. On receipt of same I will do the best I can to help you.

He Doubts It.—Conneaut, O., writes: "I take much pleasure in the World each week, especially the Department. I note that Forest City, Pa., says he gets a brilliant light with 25 amperes, but he doesn't say whether it is A. C. or D. C. If it is A. C., I am afraid the brilliant part is very much absent. I have used a rabbit's foot economizer that is supposed to take 25 amperes from the line, using a 25 ampere fuse, and deliver 45 at the arc. My picture was 10 x 12, 55 feet throw, and the light was, I must say, far from satisfactory. At the present time I am using D. C., 11½ feet picture, 70 feet throw. I control the voltage by a rope on the engine throttle and have a hand regulator on the rheostat which enables me to get from 25 to 35 amperes. With some makes of films I can produce satisfactory projection with 25 amperes, while with other makes I need about 100. I am not going to brag about my picture, but it has got to be good or I would not let up on it until it was."

That is the way to talk, Conneaut, and I wish there were more operators of the same frame of mind. The fact that the A. C. light was not satisfactory was not necessarily the fault of the transformer itself. It might have been one wound for a different voltage, or—but really there isn't any use in speculating. Several things might have been to blame. Also it may have been the fault of the transformer. I will go further than you and say that I have never yet seen a brilliant picture projected with 25 amperes of current, where the picture exceeded 10 feet in width; and even that size isn't what I would term very brilliant with that amperage. That does not hold good with a mirror or metallic surface screen, however. I take it you now use a small, isolated generating plant. What kind, please?

Outside Shutter.—North Tonawanda, N. Y., writes: "In a recent issue of the Department an operator asked if an outside shutter could be installed on the Motiograph and you were quite right in saying that the Motiograph manufacturers make an outside shutter. I knew that to be the fact, but did not know whether they made one for that particular model or not.—Ed.) Enclosed please find sketch of a shutter I put on my Motiograph No. 2, and I must say it works fine. I have operated many shows and traveled a great deal, but have seen no picture which excelled that projected with this shutter. At the lowest speed it is flickerless and at normal speed the picture is exceedingly fine. The shutter is very simple and inexpensive and I believe any operator can put one on. I will be glad to communicate with any brother operator who wishes more details and explain the matter to him as best I may. Concerning your Handbook, I have read it twice and must say it is the best teacher a man could possibly have."

I have studied the sketch submitted by North Tonawanda carefully and while it is evident he went to considerable pains to prepare the same, still I must say I am unable to get head or tail of the matter and I think we will be obliged to request another sketch. Apparently the blade of the shutter is 1¾ inches in diameter by only 1⅛ inches wide. Also, apparently, the driving shaft comes in from the crank side of the machine—impossible. Please try sketching the thing again, drawing the outline of the frame. Later, another, an excellent sketch, has been received. It will appear next week.

Long Throw.—Chambersburg, Pa., inquires: "Will I have any trouble throwing a picture 140 feet with alternating current. We now throw 100 feet. I will get the lenses to make the picture the same size as now."

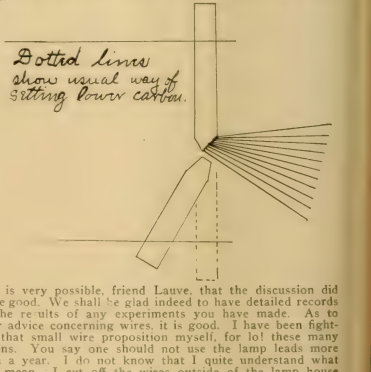
For the benefit of Chambersburg, I will again say that the throw cuts little figure, it being the size of the picture which governs the brilliancy. You will get just as good a picture at 140 feet as at 100 feet, if a half size lens is used. On 140 foot throw, unless the picture is a very large one, the lens will be of very long focal length. I would, therefore, suggest that you write to the Nicholas Power Company, 115 Nassau Street, New York City, and secure from them a half speed projection lens of proper focal length. They have a half size lens mounted so as to screw right into the regular moving picture face plate lens ring screw. It is possible that other machine manufacturers have this lens, which is something new, but I know the Powers people have it. I would, by all means, advise you to use one of them on such a throw as that, if your picture is less than, say, 18 feet in width. I would refer you to my reply to New Orleans, in another place, for further data on long throws.

Position Wanted.—Mr. J. K. Van, Northville, N. Y., who is owner of a Powers No. 5 machine, wishes a position for himself with his machine.

Very Long Throw.—New Orleans, La., writes: "I am figuring on a proposition in a park next summer. If it goes through it will be necessary that I throw a picture about 15 feet wide 475 feet. Can such a thing be done? If so, where and how can I get a lens to do it?"

Yes, New Orleans, the thing can be done. I am not certain, however, as to the general results in brilliancy for the following reasons, namely: That the lens will be of exceedingly long E. F. (29 ins.) and will, therefore, be located a long way from the aperture or film. Inasmuch as the light after passing through the film, is, to some extent, diffused, there will be some loss between the film and lens, where it is located so far away. I am not sure just what this loss will amount to. Aside from this I see no reason why a picture could not be projected that distance without material loss of light, or practically any loss at all, if the atmosphere be reasonably clear. As to the lens, I would suggest that you get lenses of different focal length and remove one of the combinations front or back, whichever seems to give the best result. I think in that way you can, by using only one combination, get a lens that will give you fairly good results at that distance; otherwise you would have to use a specially made lens. I would by all means advise you to get a half size lens for such work. You cannot perform this particular stunt with an outside shutter unless you have a very long extension put on the shutter shaft, as the lens will necessarily extend out a considerable distance.

Carbon Setting.—Mr. Charles Lauve, Franklin, La., writes: "Enclosed please find $1.50 for the Handbook. Like a good many other exhibitors, I am of the opinion that the discussion regarding carbon settings you had with a certain paper has done good. When you started out in the argument I immediately got into the game with a few experiments of my own and find from results that both yourself and Mr. Hallberg are somewhat wrong in the matter of A. C. carbon setting. A. C. carbon setting is a very particular and most important work. I might add that in my three years' experience in the picture business I have done nothing but experiment with projection. I assure you that I have made some beautiful mistakes, each one of which was, however, later crowned with success. My experiments cover wiring, condensers, objective lens, wire terminals, screens and shutters. All experiments were made while using alternating 60 cycle 115 volt current. I have also had, and am now having, experience with D. C.; but it is so simple that I pay little attention to it. My advice to exhibitors is: use wires large enough. If three-wire service to the building, use nothing under No. 6. See that all wire joints are soldered. If you are using 40 amperes or less, use No. 6 stranded wire to the lamp. If larger amperage, use larger wire. Do not use wires to the lamp more than one year. Have them long enough so that the ends connected to the terminals can be cut off when they become burned. We use one 6½ and one 7½ condenser if for throws all the way from 40 to 80 feet, which is the range of my test. May do for longer ranges. I find this combination to be best. The rule for measuring condensers does not work out. The most important thing in connection with the condensers is to focus them with your projection lens. This can be done by first focusing your picture as nearly as possible with your objective and then bring your condensers back or ahead until the picture is clear and steady. This, however, cannot be accomplished at one show on account of the heat of the condensers. However, by paying close attention to the distance of the condensers from the light, the location can be ascertained in two or three days. This is a very important part of projection, and condensers should have a focusing device the same as the objective lens. I do not recommend an outside shutter for A. C. since it does not permit the desired range of speed on account of synchronism. If you run a machine with an outside shutter fast, it will flicker a whole lot worse than a two-wing shutter. Varied speed is an important part of good projection. If any one believes that there is no difference in polarity in A. C., he is mistaken. Watch this and do away with the brownish appearance of your light. Keep the inside of your carbon holders bright; file them with a very fine file about every two weeks. Do away as much as possible with filing your carbons. Once in the lamp, the arc will give them the proper shape better than you can. Do not carry a long arc with A. C. I enclose rough sketch of the carbon setting which I have found to be the most satisfactory, in which only the crater of the upper carbon is used. There is no use trying to use the crater on both carbons, for it won't work."



It is very possible, friend Lauve, that the discussion did some good. We shall be glad indeed to have detailed records of the results of any experiments you have made. As to your advice concerning wires, it is good. I have been fighting that small wire proposition myself, for lo! these many moons. You say one should not use the lamp leads more than a year. I do not know that I quite understand what you mean. I cut off the wires outside of the lamp house once a week where I am using heavy amperage and if the amperage is very heavy I may cut them off twice a week. Of course, if the amperage is light it does not have to be done so often, but just as soon as the wires inside of the lamp house turn dark brown and the spring goes out of them they should be amputated and fresh wire brought in to the terminal. As to one 6½ and one 7½ condenser for a wide range of throw, you are wrong there, provided the picture be kept the same size. In theory the E. F. of the condenser combination and the E. F. of the objective should be the same. In practice, however, with moving pictures it seldom or never is. As a general proposition, for anything above a 4-inch E. F. objective two 7½ condensers will be found best. As to focusing the condensers, I think I know what you mean, but I am not quite certain. I wish you would write again, making your meaning a little more clear; illustrating, if necessary, by sketch. As to the outside shutter, you are wrong there, too. Wrong, for the reason that you are assuming that all outside shutters are three-wing, whereas many manufacturers send out a two-wing outside shutter if it is requested. The three-wing does not flicker at high speed, but with alternating current it produces a flashing or waving effect of the light through synchronism, at a certain speed. The advice concerning carbon holders is most excellent. As to your remarks about polarity and the brownish appearance of the light, I must confess I do not know what you have in mind there. Please be a little more explicit.

The carbon setting you show is not so good, I think, as setting the lower perpendicular and angling the top one out to meet it. I personally prefer my alternating set to be the same as D. C. set, except that the carbons are set a little more nearly central with each other. Experience has taught me that while this set is very difficult to handle, requiring close attention, yet, given this, it produces the best general results. I have long ago tried carbons straight up and down, central with each other, straight up and down with one carbon ahead of the other, set the reverse fashion and about every other conceivable way, but finally came back to the D. C. set as giving the best results when carefully handled. We shall be glad to hear from you again, friend Lauve, at your convenience.

Condensers.—Glendora, Cal., writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for Handbook. I am a careful reader of the Department and have received much valuable information therefrom. Could you advise me as to whether or not a better light will be had by using two 7½ inch condensers instead of one 6½ and one 7½? I have an Edison machine, 110 volt A. C., puling about 40 amperes. Picture is 13 feet and the throw 60. Have some trouble with yellow around the edges of the picture."

I would suggest, Glendora, that you try two 7½ inch condensers and note the result. You say you are pulling "about" 40 amperes. Possibly you are pulling considerably less. For a 14 foot picture you might better have 45 amperes than less. Also possibly you are using poor grade condensers. Look through them edgeways and if they look green they are made of poor glass and will not give you the best light. Also if the surface does not present a bright, well-polished surface, or shows wavy lines the lens is a poor one.

Carbon.—Roscoe, N. Y., asks: "What make of carbons do you recommend for alternating current?"

It is not within the province of this Department to recommend any given make of goods. I may say, however, that you should use ⅝ cored carbons both above and below for A.C. Purchase a package (50) of each of the best known makes and by the time they are used up you will probably have made up your mind which gives best results.

College Rowdies.—From Mr. R. W. Middlecamp, operator University Theater, Princeton, N. J., comes a letter setting forth difficulties under which the University Theater has been operated. It seems that the college boys, who make Princeton their home only temporarily, have little or no regard whatever for the rights or comfort of anyone but themselves. They have been in the habit of going to the theater of which Brother Middlecamp is operator and making it exceedingly unpleasant for the women, children and citizens of Princeton, who depend largely upon the little theater for their amusement. To such an extent has this been carried that the manager, Mr. Fred C. Ruhlman, finally barred the college students from the house. In this Mr. Ruhlman took the only course open to him, and the only right and decent course he could take. It became a question of catering to the decent, well-behaved, peaceful citizens of the town or to a lot of rough-house rowdy students, bent on raising all the disturbance possible and making other people as uncomfortable as they knew how. Mr. Middlecamp, the operator, has been a correspondent of the department for some time. He himself was subject to much annoyance from these hoodlums (I am sorry that it becomes necessary to class college students as hoodlums, but nevertheless that is the only term which fits under such conditions) and is correspondingly relieved that they have been excluded from the theater.

Curtain.—Mr. H. Morris, Jersey City, N. J., writes: "Will you please answer the following questions? (a) What is the best curtain coating; that is to say, the best to produce good, clear pictures? Or, to put it another way, what kind of a curtain would you advise me to install in a new house, same to be used as a drop curtain in front of stage? (b) Is there such a thing as daylight pictures? If so, how can I obtain them? Is the process in the machine or in the curtain? (c) What size condenser should I use for 60 or 65 ft. throw, 15 ft. picture? (d) Using Govcycle, 110-volt a.c., what amperage should I use at the arc, controlling the current with an American Standard rheostat? (e) What would we do without the Trouble Department? I hope to see an answer in the issue of April 22nd."

(a) Advice concerning curtain coating is a tough proposition, for the reason that there are many different ideas and many different views concerning the matter. Personally, I prefer a good grade of bleached white bed sheeting for any picture up to, say, 13 or possibly even as much as 15 feet, since on such a curtain one is able to get a more artistic picture and a picture with greater depth than can be had on anything else I have seen. On a large picture, I would prefer some of the so-called mirror screens or solar screens; that is to say, semi-reflecting ground glass or metallic surfaced screens, especially if using A.C. I would prefer this with a large picture, for the reason that you could not get the required brilliancy on a large picture, using a cloth screen, except by use of exceedingly heavy amperage. If you want a metallic surface screen you might try the one described on page 77, Jan. 14th issue. As you are in Jersey City, if you care to come over to my residence, No. 6 Bradhurst Avenue (9th Avenue "L" to 142nd Street), I will be glad to talk the curtain matter over with you and give you the benefit of any knowledge I may possess. You may come any evening except Tuesday or Friday, at 7 o'clock. (b) There are a number of "daylight" picture screens, one of which is the Herbst process in which what appears to be a stereopticon is used, though I do not know for what purpose. I gather, however, it is to project a band, or border of light around the picture and bring the picture out by contrast. The other daylight screens are semi-reflecting screens (mirror or metallic surface) and a careful, intelligent shading of the auditorium lights so that they do not strike the screen. (c) One 6½ and one 7½ or two 7½, whichever gives the best results. Use a good grade of condensor lens. (d) You should use not less than 45 amperes, A.C., on a 14 ft. picture; 50 will be better. I would suggest, however, that you install a transformer (inductor, compensarc, etc.), since using A. C. through a rheostat is exceedingly expensive, if you pull through a meter. (e) Your last question is irrelevant, Friend Morris. Your letter came too late to be answered in the issue of the 22nd.

Much Work, Little Pay.—Fergus Falls, Minn., writes: "I believe I can hold my own with the average operator, though not so advanced that I cannot still learn. I project a picture, clean-cut to the edges and without a shadow, except those of the film photography, and haven't had to stop to splice a film or adjust my carbons while running for more than three months. The requirements here are to run one reel of film and then an illustrated song; another reel and a second song without stopping. The operator is required to thread the machine while running the song slides and they even wanted me to re-wind the first reel while running the second, so as to stop only one minute to adjust the carbons at the close of the show. This I refused to do, as I do not believe there is an operator living that can do justice to his work and do two or three things at one time. The same time I am having read of what other operators are required to do. I will say that all they asked of me was to get the films from the express office, put out the advertising matter, sweep out, dust the theater, and once a week wash off the tile front; build the fires and see that everything was ready for the vaudeville and the vaudeville people ahead of them, and wait on them; ship back the films and do any electrical work required about the place, as well as operate the machine. I might add that operating was about the only thing that was not found fault with. For this work they paid me the handsome sum of $12 per week, but as the theater changed hands April 1, I was dismissed in favor of an $8 eighteen-year-old boy, who never ran a machine in his life until last year, and then only as helper. If you know of any one up in this neck of the woods who wishes to employ an operator who knows his business, is 20 years old, and has a family, kindly let me know. I am using a Powers No. 6 with outside shutter, Powers adjustable lens. Inside of the square of light which generally appears on the shutter when the machine is in motion, there is a circle of light about as large as the aperture in the film gate, and inside of this is a small circle of light about the same size as the aperture opening of still brighter light, and inside this square there is a perfect reflection of the arc, with the exception that the carbons are reversed, the upper appearing as the lower. By looking at this reflection I can always keep my arc just right. Can you explain this to me?"

Ordinarily there is a spot of light on the shutter just about the size of the aperture, if the shutter is set close to the lens. If it is set out towards the end of the spindle and the lense is of short focal length, then the size of the square will be increased. I have not noticed a reflection of the arc in this circle distinct enough to be clearly seen. There should not be a circle of light outside of the outline of the aperture, and if there is, then there is something radically wrong with your lens and you are losing light. I should like to ask our readers if any of them have encountered a similar experience, and if they have would be glad to hear their views on the matter. As for losing that

Cooling the Theater.—Mr. J. Howard Newell, Bloomfield, Ia., writes: "I see where a brother exhibitor of the South wishes information in regard to cooling his theater during the hot weather. I do not pretend to know it all, but have been very successful in keeping my theater cool in the summer. Of course, it doesn't get so hot here as it does in the South, so don't know if my plan will give satisfaction in Texas. First, over the entrance and exit doors I have a diamond-shaped window 30 x 30 inches, in each of which are installed two 12-inch fans. About half way down on each side of the walls I have a 12-inch fan. At the right side at the back near the curtain I have an 18-inch exhaust fan which pulls air from 10 to 15 feet around it. I turn the fans all toward the back; that is to say, so that they will all blow the air in the same direction, namely, towards the screen. The two fans in the front windows will pull a certain amount of fresh air in. The fans in the center of the room catch the air from those in the windows and the exhaust fan pulls it out of doors. In this way I maintain a draft through the theater. In the ceiling I have a hole cut about 3 feet square, since above the ceiling there is a dead air space which, before it was opened, heated the ceiling so hot that you could have fried eggs on it; that is, if you could have made them stick there. In the front wall of the dead-air space I have cut a hole about 2 feet by 18 inches. When open this lets a current of air pass up through the hole in the ceiling and out through the one in the wall. In the hole in the ceiling I have installed an 18-inch exhaust fan with a 12-inch fan in front opening of the dead-air space."

In addition to the above description, Neighbor Newell sends in a sketch, but inasmuch as the descriptive matter is very clear and the sketch would be a somewhat difficult one to make intelligible, I think it will not be necessary to use it. Will be glad to publish other schemes for theater cooling. Friend Newell's idea is practical and ought to be pretty effective too.

Daylight Pictures.—Mr. John Strong, Springfield, O., writes: "I find the World very instructive and interesting. I am now and have been ever since February 20 running daylight pictures, using a Standard machine with the Herbst attachment. I believe I am the first to run the daylight pictures in this part of the wilderness. The Herbst process is very satisfactory; it gives a good picture with all the house lights on. I have been running very poor films, but even with them I get an excellent picture. I have not had any trouble lately, so need not ask you any questions. Find program of our theater enclosed, telling of the pictures. In closing I wish the World and the Department unlimited success."

The program sent in looks like a money maker. I really don't see so much in it about the pictures, but I do see enough advertising to certainly make it a money getter. I would like to have neighbor Strong describe the Herbst process of daylight pictures for the benefit of the Department readers; that is to say, tell us, if you will, just what the "daylight" end of it consists of, and what is really done by the stereopticon attachment, which I understand is part of the Herbst process.

PLEASING YOUR PATRONS.

Among the many ideas for souvenirs which our readers will find in our advertising columns, we note an excellent one in the picture postals of leading actors and actresses in both Licensed and Independent stock companies, advertised by K. A. Williams, of 1001 Fox Street, N. Y. City. On account of the desire of many in the audience to know something of the personality of the people on the screen, we believe exhibitors would find a ready and profitable sale for these postals among their patrons.

The slides of actors and actresses of the Independent stock companies, which are advertised by the Independent Photoslide Co., 147 Fourth Avenue, New York, is another suggestion that should prove an acceptable thing with most audiences. If exhibitors secured a set of these slides and had the actors and actresses in the cast of each picture shown on the screen just before each reel, with a slide giving a few words of explanation, it would undoubtedly please and be apperciated by every audience.

Our advertising columns are well worth scanning from week to week as they contain many such tips, as well as the latest and best ideas and suggestions as to equipment and decoration.

WHO WANTS TO MAKE ARCTIC PICTURES?

Rudolph Franke, 419 West 39th Street, New York City, desires to hear from any film manufacturer who wishes to make pictures in the Arctic Regions. He has spent two years in the Arctics and knows all the interesting points, and believes that some films could be made there of a very interesting nature.

LICENSED.

"Was He a Coward?" (Biograph).—In this photoplay the fact is plainly illustrated that there are two varieties of bravery. One brutal and the other moral, the truest kind of bravery. This film represents a man who had comparatively little of the former, but when all others were frightened at the outbreak of a dangerous disease, he nursed the victims back to health, almost losing his own life in doing it. The film is one of those that appeal very strongly to a sentiment which lies dormant in the heart of every person and always is ready to appear on any display of true courage. It is one of those Biograph sermons that have made a favorable impression ever since they began to appear upon the screens. Through it runs a love story which gives it heart interest and develops more tenderness than would be the case without it. When love and bravery are united the resulting film is always apt to be pleasing.

"Mandy's Social Whirl" (Lubin).—This comedy represents the consternation caused by a country girl who got into the wrong house in the city. She had the time of her life for awhile, and was under the impression that being maid-of-all-work was a picnic. But later this mistake was rectified and her vacation came to a sudden end. The comedy is delicious, and the situations interesting.

"The School Marm of Coyote County" (Melies).—We have here a delightful Western picture which has plenty of action and does not illustrate any improbabilities. The "school marm" is one of the most attractive Western girls seen in some time; also, the other artists have interpreted the different personalities to good advantage. The settings, the costuming and the accessories are all in harmony. The idea of a "school marm" acting as judge to prevent a lynching is a novelty which will please any audience. Managers will make no mistake in showing this picture.

"The Man From the East" (Selig).—This Western drama has plenty of life and action. Its most satisfactory portion is the dexterity of the supposed tenderfoot and his success in disconcerting the bullies of the ranch. That he overcomes them one after another and ultimately is reunited to his sweetheart makes a good story, though dramatic qualities may be lacking. The good, red blood indicated in the action of the different characters keeps interest alive from beginning to end.

"Silver Threads Among the Gold" (Edison).—Everybody probably recognizes the title of the old song which has been popular for many years, and almost everybody understands its sentiment. The Edison players have reproduced it in a way to make it peculiarly attractive. No one cares to grow old, and when the fact of age is impressed upon anyone as forcibly as it was upon the woman here represented, the pain is often tragic. In that respect the film follows life closely and unquestionably emphasizes very natural sentiments. Indeed, the picture is drawn so true to life that it appears more like a load from actual experience than a picture. With the musicians following each of the pictures with the well known melody varying expression to suit, and making it an unconscious undertone to the story, the closing scenes, when the husband declares that she "has never older grown" causes a suspicious moisture under the eyelids. All of middle age will enjoy this picture because it will mean much to them. Youth also will enjoy it, for its sentiment will touch all. It will rank as one of the best, if not the very best, of the week.

"A Card of Introduction" (Edison).—This sparkling comedy depicts in a very way the misadventures of a poor chap who presents a card of introduction in Paris. The "friend" who gave it to him was jealous and it was written in French —but he could have understood French he would have needed no card. It said, "Beware, this man is recovering from smallpox." How was that for a card to hand around and was it a wonder that none who saw it took him to his bosom? However, it helped him to get the girl and that was what his smart friend didn't want.

"In Old Florida" (Kalem).—This romance purports to represent the Florida of the Spanish regime, with its Dons, its proud parents, its duels and other romantic accessories. But in the true American fashion the young man wins the duel with the Spaniard and marries the girl, despite parental objections.

"Beneath the Tower Ruins" (Urban).—Apart from the story this picture possesses an attractive scenic interest. The burial and discovery of a hoard of treasure, and the love story connected therewith will be looked at with interest, yet the narrative, on the other hand, contains nothing of peculiar interest unless it is the ghosts (one is dressed in a black frock coat, the other wears black trousers) which appear at opportune times and frighten designing individuals into desisting from their nefarious work of trying to get the hoard. The scenic qualities are very high, however, and the play may constitute a pleasing feature of the program.

"The Abbey of Pavia, Italy" (Urban).—This film gives us a peep into monastic conditions which have existed unchanged for centuries. The glimpses of what the monks actually do, and have done from time immemorial, are well worth seeing, and the picturesque setting will go far toward increasing the film's attractions.

"A Cowboy's Adventure" (Pathe).—This Western picture by the American Pathe Company, is cast in a typical setting about a saloon, with cowboys, Indians and others. It has a near-lynching party, perhaps as spice to enliven what may be considered by some a rather common-place picture. It is Western, however, and will be pleasing to many.

"Coco" (Pathe.—This amusing picture gives the antics of a pet monkey. He investigates a phonograph to discover where the voice comes from and then utilizes the revolving record as a merry-go-round. He cuts up other capers.

"Paradise Lost" (Biograph).—A novel conception is here admirably worked out. The surprise of the drunkard when he awoke to what he believes is Paradise, with beautiful angels ministering to him, is complete. Then the return to the gutter is such a shock that he vows never to touch the stuff again. The picture is not dramatic but is suggestive of thought and, therefore, interesting.

"Their Mothers-in-Law" (Lubin).—One mother-in-law is usually thought to be sufficient to create enough trouble in one household. The situation can be imagined when a second one appears. As may well be expected the young married couple are unable to stand the strain and decamp, leaving the mothers to find out who is who, by themselves. When they get the letter, addressed "To Our Dear Mothers," they fall into each other's arms.

"Jack Mason's Last Deal" (Melies).—This is a story of gambling in the West, and of the regeneration of a professional gambler through the influence of a girl. The gambler restores to her father all his money, and when the girl marries him the little Western town is suffused with the brilliancy of their happiness.

"His Best Girl's Little Brother" (Selig).—This short comedy needs no description. Most men have suffered from similar unpleasant individuals and the sympathy of the male portion of the audience will be aroused through the tan. But, of course, it's overdrawn.

"Zululand" (Selig).—In this screen we have an intensely interesting background the wide grassy plains of Africa. When the trecking party encamp at night, in the trees, two wild, free lions come out and rob it of meat. The presence of these real lions has caused some discussion. I heard some one say that it was a mighty smart photographer who got that background, but that he showed a very slight knowledge of military possibilities. This critic was a U. S. captain and the Zulu attack on the hospital was not conducted as he thought it should have been. The story didn't seem to me either interesting to itself or humanely possibly.

"The Court Martial" (Gaumont).—Only excellent photographs suppose any excuse for the existence of this film. The story is unusual and the denouement, and is based upon conditions not understood here. The disappointment of the original lover is an unpleasant shock which the periods of the still does not justify. The film was received in absolute silence.

"Picturesque Waterfalls in Northern Spain" (Gaumont).—

This film presents a series of falls near Sarragossa which are photographed with artistic appreciation. It is one of the most attractive outdoor pictures seen in some time. The difficulties of photographing falling water and the surrounding scenery also, have been satisfactorily overcome, resulting in the pleasing presentation of an extremely difficult subject.

"The Wooing of Winifred" (Vitagraph).—This polite drama, presenting a series of complications resulting from the will of an uncle who decrees that cousins shall marry if they are to inherit his property. The cousins, strangers to each other, meet, and in a novel way discover each other's identity and then, quite contrary to the usual practice in such instances, lose no time in marrying. It is all cleverly worked out and makes an attractive photoplay, full of situations that give the Vitagraph Company an excellent chance to use its remarkable power of making comedy.

"Madam Rex" (Biograph).—The principal theme in this story is a mother's sacrifices of her own love to insure the happiness of her daughter. The mother found herself compelled to run a gambling house. She has kept her daughter in ignorance of this, and has had her educated in a convent. The man to whom the mother is engaged falls in love with the daughter without knowing this relationship. Almost the same thing was shown in a film released a day or two before. Another coincidence was that it was released by the company that is most like the Biograph. True, the incidents varied, but the main idea is the same, viz.: a mother's sacrificing herself for her daughter's happiness. The picture is not agreeable, though no one can successfully deny its dramatic power.

"The Two Fathers" (Lubin).—This picture tells the story of a man, who because he is destitude, is obliged to give his baby daughter away to a wealthy friend, who adopts her. In after years he obtains a position as butler in the house, so that he may be near her. In this way he learns of a marriage into which she is to be forced and interferes, only to learn that he has no right to do so. Fate intervenes and the hateful wedding does not take place. The two fathers become friends. This domestic story is interesting chiefly because it is unusual, but, as it is presented, it seems improbable.

"Robert, the Silent" (Pathe).—This is a remarkable story. It may be interesting to some to see a girl cast into a dungeon with skeletons and die from fright, and to watch this, followed by the suicide of the man responsible; but the interest will be in direct proportion to the errors the review exhibition causes. There is, it is true, a certain element of fascination in a picture of this character, but for all that it is unpleasant and the memory of it is even worse.

"The Haven of Refuge" (Selig).—This is a picture of California ranch life, with a romance. The story takes place in the early thirties when all that country was under Spanish rule, and is woven around the old San Fernando ranch. Perhaps the principal interest is the reproduction of that picturesque scenery. The haven of refuge in this instance is the Church. Thither the beautiful daughter of the owner of the ranch repairs, when in the wild passion of a Mexican romance, she has saved herself by stabbing the perfidious suitor. Her confession of her deed saves her true lover. The Padre holds up the cross and the girl drops to the ground in tears. Don Jose forgives his daughter. There is plenty of life and incident, which, together with the picturesque setting, make up a picture that pleased the audience.

"A Buried Past" (Edison).—This well-told story shows a man who has served his term in prison, but is making good. He is confronted at a critical moment in his career by a man who knows his prison record. Happily everything works out satisfactorily. The story is an excellent one of its kind. The players perform their parts with sympathy.

"Slim Jim's Last Chance" (Kalem).—This story is not unlike that of another release during the week, depicting the way a man's prison record may follow him regardless of the fact that for years he may have lived an exemplary life. The melodramatic features introduced, including a fight with Indians and the love talk may increase the attractiveness the story will have for some, but will scarcely make the suggestions any more forcible.

"Wiffles' Home Troubles" (Pathe).—Wiffles thinks he will be able to get on all right, even if Mrs. Wiffles has gone back to her mother, but when he has to sew on buttons he suddenly acquires a fresh viewpoint and plainly wishes he hadn't. Then Mrs. Whiffles unexpectedly returns for something and the separation ceases.

"How Edam Cheese is Made" (Pathe).—This interesting industrial film illustrates in detail how and where Edam cheese is made. The pictures of Dutch industries are attractive additions to any program.

"Though Your Sins Be As Scarlet" (Vitagraph).—This film tells the story of a Greek courtesan, who becomes aware of the sinfulness of her life and ultimately acquires purity of soul. It is dramatic symbolism.

"Easter Babies" (Vitagraph).—This film puts in concrete form the conceit of the children regarding Easter eggs. It is an excellent juvenile and one that grown-ups will not hesitate to watch with more than the ordinary degree of interest. "Easter Babies" is one of those films that does one good to look at.

"The Oppressor" (Gaumont).—On this film we see a gloomy story of a wicked prince. He oppresses his subjects. He is blind on one side and deaf on the other and choses to listen to grievances with the bad ear and look at wrongs with the bad eye. He even imprisons his daughter and her lover. But ultimately fate intervenes and the daughter and her husband have a happy reign. After seeing this film one wonders the reason for such a waste of valuable material.

"Jimmy, the Fox" (Gaumont).—This film depicts the exploits of a small boy who successfully impersonates deafness. That is all there is of the story that is interesting.

"The Burglar's Fee" (Pathe).—This is a semi-humorous film. It pictures an episode in the life of a doctor and his young wife. The wife unjustly suspects her husband and takes poison. The burglar enters, finds her semi-unconscious, sees that she has taken poison and telephones to the doctor, who instructs him to keep the young woman walking till he gets there. The doctor comes, cures the wife and then policemen come. The doctor gives the burglar a job and sends the policemen away. The burglar as soon as the doctor leaves the room takes a "consultation fee" of $50 and escapes. The taking of this fee and the burglar's explanation is the most humorous part of the story, though to see him walking the wife up and down the room passes for a delightful bit of work.

"The Bad Man's First Prayer" (Essanay).—It is rather difficult to understand just what is intended by this film. The scenes in the bar rooms, and the attempt at "holding up" a stage are all typical, but to have the man who sacrificed himself to save another, on his knees in a cell with no further explanation scarcely finishes the picture. Perhaps the audience is intended to use its imagination in supplying its own ending, which might be almost anything. Because of this close the film is not altogether pleasing.

"The Haunted Sentinel Tower" (Edison).—This romance takes place in a most approved romantic setting. An old fortress by moonlight is sufficient basis for almost any sort of a love story, and this one, told about two lovers, whose ghosts appear upon one of the towers, is quite sufficient to keep an audience attentive. The Edison Company has caught the spirit of the time and season and has produced a film which has many excellencies. The story of the past is admirably told and the awe of the present lovers is admirably shown by their acting and facial expression as the sentinel tells them the story.

"What Happened to Aunty" (Essanay).—This comedy is filled with surprises for Aunty, and likewise for a poor wandering tramp. Aunty didn't want the lovers to marry. An elopement is proposed. Aunty finds it out, dresses up as the neice and goes to keep the tryst. Aunty is willing to get married. Neice sends a tramp to her lover with a note: "Aunty is coming to marry you." The lover dresses up the tramp to impersonate him. What the tramp gets, after the ceremony, makes him prefer a watery grave. Aunty chases him off the dock. Aunty's facial expression is excruciating, but the chase about the city is very tiresome.

"Catching Deep Sea Turtle" (Essanay).—This film gives views showing how the huge turtles are caught in the Caribbean Sea. The one shown weighed over 900 pounds. An educational film of novel interest. The pictures are thin and misty and the film has no beauty.

"Lost Years" (Gaumont).—This is a story with a tragic beginning, based upon loss of reason through grief. Long years afterward reason is restored and happiness again reigns in the united household. Neither very good, nor very bad, but, in the main, this film gives an unpleasant story.

"Brest, a Fortified Harbor of France" (Gaumont).—The largest commercial and military seaport of France is here shown. Brest has a magnificent harbor in which 500 battleships can find safe shelter. The old castle of the Duke of Brittany, the arsenal employing thousands of workmen and the huge swing bridge are shown and are all objects of superior interest.

"The Leading Lady" (Vitagraph).—This lively comedy based upon the putting of an Irish cook into a new play. The disturbances caused by her strenuous objections to receiving instruction will afford much laughter. When she gets all done and goes back to her kitchen the company suspends operations for a time. Indeed, judging from her vigorous movements, this company is extremely ortunate to escape the hospital or the morgue.

INDEPENDENT.

"How the Doctor Made Good" (Powers).—This comedy represents the original means a young doctor used to secure the consent of his sweetheart's father to their marriage. Perhaps making the family ill could not be defended upon grounds of honesty, yet one of old has said that all is fair in love, consequently the young doctor's ruse can be condoned. Anyhow, he healed the sufferers and got the girl. The comedy is sparkling and quite new in its inception and working out.

"Reclamation" (Powers).—This drama tells a heart story with such interest and pathos that the audience maintains its interest from beginning to end. The story is clear, and the actors perform their parts with understanding. The resulting photoplay is satisfactory to most audiences.

"Velvet and Rags" (Thanhouser).—This reel gives us a well staged, well acted photoplay, detailing the experiences of two discontented youngsters. It is boy-like for the scion of a wealthy family to want to operate a peanut roaster. It is human for the son of the peanut roaster to sigh for the enjoyment of wealth. They change places and both wake up to what is unpleasant in the situation about the same time. Eventually they both get into the big house and get what they both lacked, namely, love and sympathy. The story is well told and none of the episodes are impossible. The mechanical work is well done, while the acting of the two boys is pleasing.

"Was it Worth While?" (Nestor).—This is a story of perfidy, happily corrected in time to prevent the ruining of two lives. Perhaps it may be said that it illustrates the misapprehension which existed in one man's mind regarding his love for a particular woman. It is a plain story, plainly told, and, as it proceeds, developing much heart interest. The photography is excellent, as is the case with most of the Nestor films.

"The Girl and the Oath" (Champion).—In this story one girl is represented as disappointed in love, because the man in the case marries her sister, or supposed sister. The scene in which Amy denounces Helene as only a foster sister is dramatic. The close, representing the two women as forgetting their difficulties because of the approach of an interesting event, relieves the tension caused by the stormy scene and leaves a good impression on the audience.

"Men of the West" (Champion).—A mixup occurs in marital affairs due to a girl's misunderstanding regarding the status of a man she has met. However, a single brother of the man steps into the breach and marries her, fulfilling all requirements, and disposing of a possible scandal in a very satisfactory manner. The picture has the swing and go of the West, and will carry the audience with it.

"Tramp Strategy" (Solax).—A comedy, it deals with the plan of two girls to concoct a romantic conspiracy. The unfortunate young man is kidnapped by tramps and locked up. Then, after some humorous complications, the difficulties are settled to everybody's satisfaction.

"The Scheme that Failed" (Solax).—This comedy presents, in a sparkling film, the results of a scheme that ignominiously failed to get anywhere or accomplish anything. But while the film is running there is ample opportunity for the audience to laugh, which it is likely to do vociferously.

"The Little Major" (Rex).—This film is reviewed at length elsewhere in this issue. The story is a suggestive psychological study. Briefly it represents a child virtually calling his mother back to life when to all appearances she is dead. The feature is the acting of the child, which is so earne t and sincere that the audience forgets for the time that it is looking at a picture. It forgets everything but the earnestness and faith of the "Little Major." But there is no applause. The picture is too deep and too earnest, and deals with something so sacred that it cannot be expressed by applause.

"The Storm" (Imp).—This is a highly emotional play which ends happily. Perhaps it is one of the few times on record when a drunken brawl leads to beneficial results. Here the inference is plain that without the drinking and the subsequent fight two men would have been lost when the ship foundered in the storm. Yet the audience will enjoy the happiness of the two women when their husbands return to them, regardless of the source of their preservation.

"Jimmy Minds the Baby" (American).—This film gives us a bright comedy, depicting the difficulties of Jimmy and the baby. They followed their blissfully ignorant parents to the theater and saw the play from the wings. It is, of course, somewhat startling to see the real baby tossed into a theatrical snowdrift in place of the usual rag doll, and the frantic action of the parents when they see the sketch and recognize the baby, affords a scene not down on the program. In the denouement Jimmy is taken by his father, as fathers often take their sons, and receives considerable stimulation. Why? Perhaps because father is the larger.

"The Bungalow Craze" (American).—This is a lively comedy, timely and interesting, and possibly containing a warning to husbands who may be even now (it's near spring) searching for bungalows. With Samuel Weller, it probably will be a case of "beware the winders," if they are handsome and offer to show you a bungalow. Wives are prone to misunderstand and trouble may sit on your bungalow steps as it did here.

"Two Plucky Girls" (American).—This film gives a lively story of two girls, two robbers and what eventually happened to the interesting quartet. There is plenty of life, lots of entertaining action and an ending as enjoyable as it is unexpected. The audience apparently thoroughly enjoyed the film.

"With Stonewall Jackson" (Champion).—In this elaborate war picture of the days when the fires of patriotism burned brightly, the roar and din of battle can almost be heard so realistic is the picture. The courage of the young wife who takes her husband's place in the army is a thrilling bit of drama. She fails a charge; the young man, regenerated or awakened, returns and establishes a reputation for bravery, but dies in the attempt. The closing scene as the stiffening fingers twine the Colors together is impressive and memorable. Most audiences like war pictures. This one is exceptionally strong in most of its features and the audience watches it with wrapt interest.

"Dog and Wolf" (Eclair).—This is really a study in sociology. It presents what was supposed to occur when a gentleman took a half-famished tramp into his house, bound up his wounds and fed him. The picture is interesting and suggestive. It is more a sermon than an entertaining story. However, many people like a little of this sort of thing.

"Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives" (Eclair).—This picture is very suitable for the Easter season. It gives a series of interesting and accurate views of the Holy City and its environs, and is made all the more striking by the inclusion of a number of pictures of modern buildings, including mosques and temples. The photography is unusually clear and the operator chose his viewpoints with feeling for the beautiful and appreciation of artistic possibilities.

"The Stampede" (Imp).—The wild rush of a stampede, a woman trampled to death and a child saved thereby, together with the love story which develops later, combines to make this a picture which keeps the audience up to a tense interest. It depicts this type of life very graphically. The later kidnapping of the child, grown now to womanhood, and the plainly intimated improper advances on the part of the outlaw, who is really her father, and the finding of the locket which reveals the relationship to him, give the actors an excellent chance to show dramatic imagination. The death of the outlaw is the finale in this exciting picture. The film carries the audience along with such a dash and swing that defects are scarcely noticed, if indeed, any exist.

"A Close Call" (Yankee).—Here we have a horse-thief story. A new arrival in the family of a rancher brings a train of circumstances that makes the sheriff suppose him to be the horse-thief. The letter announcing this wee, new arrival, when shown, convinces the sheriff that the new-made father is innocent. When later the man finds the real thief wounded and being ministered to in his own house he promptly turns him over to the sheriff. Mawkish sentiment, which has often marred films of this character, has no place in this film. ,

"Bill and the Greased Pole" (Lux).—This slap-stick farce is made up of adventures with the old, time-honored greased pole of a country village. This time it creates considerable consternation and many hearty laughs result in consequence.

"They Did Not Budge" (Lux).—This comedy presents a country family at a photographer's. Before the picture can be taken the photographer goes away. The family waits, refusing to leave for years. The changes in the people when the years have passed are cleverly managed, and when ultimately the photographer returns and makes the picture what has occurred is very remarkable. It is funny by suggestion rather than because of anything done.

"The Little Flower Girl" (Solax).—Here we have a love story, presenting what occurred when a wealthy young man fell in love with a flower girl. The accomplishments of the flower girl are almost too plainly apparent for one in her station. Aside from this the story is interesting enough and probable enough.

"Old Home Week" (Thanhouser).—Though this picture does not present the poetic and sentimental side of the return of natives to familiar scenes, it must be confessed that it very closely approaches the truth of many such a homecoming. A man's welcome home is too often dependent upon the size of his bank deposits. This picture violates the probabilities in only one particular. The millionaire buys the railroad and tacks up a sign informing the public that trains no longer stop at that station. Aside from this the picture is remarkably well drawn, and unquestionably presents a view of life which more closely approaches the actual than is ordinarily the case in moving picture films.

"Willie's Winning Ways" (Yankee).—This film gives another love story, with objecting parents and other troublesome obstacles, all overcome by the success of the young man on the race track. Perhaps moralists will find fault with this picture on this account.

"Her Mother's Love" (Reliance).—While all who see this film must admit its strength, it is not very pleasant. Also, it has an element of improbability. Probably one of the most striking, and at the same time most disagreeable scenes ever shown on the screen is the one where the mother is peering through the window, seeing her daughter married to the man she herself loves, while she has become a voluntary exile to insure her daughter's happiness. It is a dramatic climax that makes one chilly with its pathetic suggestions. The rest of the story is commonplace, representing what often enough comes to women left alone in the world.

"At the Window" (Powers).—This film is scarcely worthy of the firm that released it. It is a picture of life among lowly Italians. A band attempts to entice a man's wife away, and succeeds, but meets his deserts at the hands of another and the family is re-united. When the villain is disposed of it is done out of sight of the audience and what has happened is made plain by inference. This is a desirable feature and might well be copied by other manufacturers when they want to introduce a rough scene. The photography might well be better, under-exposure is apparent on much of the film. The actors do well, but their opportunities are limited.

"The Gallant Capt. d'Armaynac" (Cines).—This film ostensibly depicts life in old France. It is a love story with the usual lover, objecting parent, and a rival in the form of a count favored by the stern father. The captain is a brave man, however, and no laggard in love either, and despite the machinations of plotters he appears, claims his sweetheart, defeats his rival in a duel, breaks his sword across his knee when the girl's father wants to fight him and ultimately receives the father's blessing. We have here a lot of romance crowded into a short film. Costumes and stage settings are elaborate; acting is good, and the whole film is conceived upon a big scale. There are places on the film, though, where it is almost impossible to distinguish the figures because of under-exposure. A little longer time, or a little stronger light, would have made of this picture a notable production.

"A Vanished Dream" (Cines).—We have here another trick comedy which contains some interesting transformations including the assembling of the portions of a dismembered man. The final vigorous belabornent with a broom is quite the most amusing portion of the picture. The woman is a very successful manipulator of that handy instrument of torture.

"Copper Wit" (Powers).—This humorous skit shows the way a cop deceived a roundsman and escaped from a cellar where he was supposed to be safely imprisoned. The huge basket of bread that passed McGinnis looked innocent enough, but it contained the burly form of his rival for the favor of Mary Ellen.

"The Wine Harvest" (Powers).—Here we have another of this company's excellent industrial pictures. This time the peasants of southern France are shown making wine from the grapes that flourish on the sunny slopes of their hills. All the processes are adequately illustrated, beginning with plucking the grapes and ending with the shipment of the fully ripened wine.

"Cally's Comet" (Thanhouser).—This comedy offers a novelty. Its scenes are laid in the observatory of a professor of astronomy. The love story is interfered with by the professor, who objects so strenuously to Jack that he ejects him with more force than elegance. Jack wins, for the restoration of the comet by means of the paintbrush secures him the object of his affection. And all runs smoothly afterward. It is a pleasant comedy, with a touch of novelty that increases its interest.

AMERICAN SPECIAL REELS FOR EUROPE.

We learn that arrangements have been completed within the past few days whereby two well known special reels are to cross the ocean and gain new laurels and applause from European audiences.

Mr. Ludwig Gottschalk of Dusseldorf, Germany, has secured the rights for Eastern Europe of the well known Buffalo Bill & Pawnee Bill Film Company picture and has also purchased the rights for all of Europe, except the British Isles, of the equally well known Tournament Film Company's Cowboy and Indian Celebration.

These typical American pictures should do much to popularize our product with European exhibitors and audiences, and will undoubtedly help to broaden the market for American-made reels to an appreciable extent.

A PROGRESSIVE EXHIBITOR.

The Theatorium at Shamokin, Pa., believes in getting the best and giving the best. They have been conducting experiments for some time back on the best methods of projection under the direction of Dr. W. L. Reeger, with a result that pictures shown in this house are the brightest and the clearest to be seen anywhere. The Theatorium runs two reels of first run licensed films each day with a five cent admission, which we believe is the most satisfactory and profitable programme for a strictly moving picture house. They carry a four-inch, three-column advertisement in the "Shamokin Daily News," in which they feature the titles of the picture of the day together with a brief description.

Mr. Franz C. Koenig, architect, 2012-20 Parkside Avenue, Philadelphia, is preparing plans for a $100,000 theater to be erected in Philadelphia near Allegheny Avenue and Frankford Avenue, for a New York and Philadelphia syndicate. It will be a modern playhouse with one balcony, iron and concrete construction, and will be one of the finest in Philadelphia; something new in the theatrical line. Special attention is given to the public's comfort and also to the moving pictures, the stage will be large and the house will have a seating capacity of 2,200. Mr. Koenig will be ready for bids about May 15th. There are several smaller theaters on the boards in Mr. Koenig's office which will be ready in a short time.

Letters to the Editor

FOR BETTER CONDITIONS.

Pittsburg, Pa., April 14, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—As subscribers to the World we would request some of your space to express our views and opinions on the condition of the moving picture business in the Pittsburg district. After carefully surveying the conditions here, it can be said that the greatest evils in the business to-day are caused by the exhibitors themselves by cut-throat competition, where one man owns two theaters, he will sell a ticket for five cents, admitting a person to both theaters on the one ticket. The other exhibitors, to save themselves, will increase the sizes of their shows to five or eight reels for five cents. Just so long as they remain unorganized, this will probably continue from bad to worse. What the exhibitors do not do to kill the business, the so-called law makers will very likely do.

The exhibitors here are in no position to protect themselves, and their only hope lies in organization. We invite them all to join our league, no matter where their place of business is located. We want a National organization and a National Convention that will bring about the best form of organization suitable to our business; therefore, the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania makes the motion that the convention be held in Cleveland, Ohio, the second week in July and we hope to hear a second to this motion. We request all exhibitors to get into action and do something for themselves, as no one will do it for them. We must not forget the true saying that he who wants liberty must himself strike the blow. Anything that is not worth striving for, is not worth having. Now, let us hear from you. Address all communications to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, 233 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburg, Pa.

Yours very truly,
THE SECRETARY.

VENTILATING THE THEATER.

Smith Center, Kans., April 4, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—In the April 8th issue of the World you have an inquiry from an exhibitor in the South as to the best method of ventilating his theater for the year round.

We are very proud of the method we use, as follows, which gives the best results: We have two 18-inch Emerson Exhaust Fans which move 6,000 cubic feet of air per minute and in addition we have six 16-inch wall fans and one 12-inch fan for the operating booth. The size of our interior is 60x25. We run the rear round and haven't closed down a single night. We have been in business since Jan. 29, 1909. We certainly have some hot weather during the summer season and our patrons often remark they can come here and always be sure of getting cooled off. We also might add we do a much better business in the summer than winter. Of course it costs considerable money to install such a system, but if you let the people know it you will sure get results at the box office window. As this exhibitor has the wall fans, all he will have to get will be the proper size exhaust fan and he will have no trouble in keeping his theater cool and well ventilated, which is very necessary in running a theater of any kind. And by all means buy a standard fan.

Trusting this will be the means of helping this exhibitor, we are,
Yours truly,
STEVENS BROS.,
Proprietors Wonderland Theater.

SLIDES FROM TYPE.

April 10, 1911.

Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen.—In looking over the last number of your valuable paper I noticed an article written by Mr. James Martin in reference to making announcement slides from ordinary printing type, and want to say that I have made and used such for years. They are very nice and satisfactory, but to go to a printer and have only one of each kind made at a time would cost about as much as a hand-made slide. First, the type has to be set, then locked up with bearers—so the roller will ink even, then you have to have a clean washed roller to run over the type, the impression made on this roller is then transferred to the glass slide. To get that impression in center and squared up is difficult, as you suggested in your comment. I own a complete printing plant and that is the reason I use them.

Yours truly,
CHAS. FARRELL.

FRAMING THE SCREEN.

Scranton, Pa., April 12, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—Noticing that Mr. Rothapfel, of "daylight picture" fame, is using among other things a dull black border or frame for his pictures and is apparently taking credit to himself as the originator of this idea, would state that the same originated in the mind of Mr. J. M. Mullin, of the former Mullin Film Service of Syracuse, N. Y., who gave the idea to the writer, who in turn passed it on to Mr. Rothapfel, who promised, at the time, to give proper credit to Mr. Mullin in one of his articles he was then writing for the Motion Picture World; but, up to date, I fail to find that he has done so.

Several of our customers are using this idea to their entire satisfaction, and I would be glad to give a sketch and instructions to any exhibitor who is interested enough to inquire, free of all charge.

I have no desire to enter into controversy with Mr. Rothapfel, but merely wish to see fair play.

Sincerely yours,
GEO. B. ROCKWELL.

FAVORS AN OPEN MARKET.

Jackson, Mich., April 11, 1911.

Gentlemen:—Enclosed find $2. subscription to M. P. World. I want to extend my hearty, fraternal wishes for your success in the Open Market campaign. It is the exhibitor's salvation, poor quality's Nemesis, and the beacon light of progression.

I could unfold a tale of exhibitor's serfdom that would make most exhibitors stop and think, but modesty forbids. But if any man in Michigan has more cause to hail the advent of "Open Market" he has my sympathy. Keep up your fusilade, you are bound to win. The Open Market must and will come, and the sooner it comes the sooner can we look for better quality, more freedom of selection and a grand and lengthy stride toward the goal, which we can never hope to reach under existing conditions.

Resp. yours, J. J. RIEDER.

However, the leader of the mob, reasoning on the matter, sees the open window, and looking out, discovers them escaping. They start in pursuit.

The chevalier tries to throw their pursuers off the track by taking refuge in the deserted Chateau of the three towers. They have hardly entered, however, when the three ruffians appear and seeing no other possible means of escape decide to search the chateau. The Chevalier, having safely placed his wife in one of the towers, moves her to go to the top. He has scarcely disappeared, however, when the three ruffians, having searched the other tower, discover her in the opposite tower. They proceed to the top and all meet and one of them starts over, but as he is about to step into the other tower and seems her, she grasps the end of the bridge, and giving it a quick turn, dashes him to death, below, and draws the plank into the tower.

sound inactive in order to reach the other tower. She is only seen ascending and closes the trap door leading into the tower. The ruffians begin battering on the door, and seeing it about to give, she seizes the plank, pulls it across to the other tower and then lowers just enough under way into the door. She then pulls her up and as the ruffians start back to secure them apparently battering ram, she draws the plank back and replaces the plank over to the other tower again and covers just in the nick of time.

She is left alone in the tower, while the crew ascends the other tower, thus cutting off communication. Miriam overpowers their guard and resolves to die death bravely. She hears noise outside, assaulting the steps and seizing a shield, a dagger and a pistol she goes resolutely through the trap door, when, to her great relief, she finds it to be the Chevalier. As the ruffian comes into view behind the Chevalier falls dead at a blow of the shield. Hastily donning the insensible person's coat and hat, he signals to the other in the opposite tower to come over. He leads to time in doing so and when he enters the tower through the trap door, the Chevalier engages in a fierce hand-to-hand fight. At the critical moment Miriam seizes the ruffian by the feet and together they hurl him down headlong.

The Chevalier finds in the pocket of the coat he is wearing a paper stating that he is a member of the National Assembly. Armed with this they make their way from the tower, only to be confronted by a party of soldiers and finding soon the waiting horses demand an explanation. The Chevalier presents his membership paper and taking the leader aside, confidentially explains that the woman is a Royalist whom he has captured and that he is taking her to Paris as a prisoner. This appeals to their pride sense of humor, and wishing him joy of his prisoner, they go their way. The Chevalier and his bride reunited the Chevalier and his bride mount their horses and away.

His condition is too serious, however, so she takes her violin and plays outside of the room where he lies in agony. Enrico hears the enchanting tune, and rising in bed with his last strength, demands that she be allowed in; poor Lotta rushes to his side but he has lost in the battle—with a last caress, he falls back dead.

A DAY WITH AN ENGLISH BARGEMAN.—The most picturesque of small water seafaring folk is the bargeman, who takes up on a trip up the canal, through its power feeding locks and across the beautiful countryside. We see the one mile power station, the Blisdale, and even the happy boys who choose the canal for their aquatic diversion. They dive in and race as only boys can. Then we join the bargeman again and proceed with him to the end of the busy little canal.

HEARTS UNDER OILSKINS.—Cast up by the sea, it is the lot of little Dollie to be adopted by lighthearted bearded Jim. He rears her lovingly, and when she grows into fair Dollie Jim quickly, secretly owns her.

Bill and Bob the big tower bell proclaims that the angry sea has wrecked a vessel, and Jim, with the rest of the fisher folk, goes out to the rescue. One of those rescued is none other than Frank, Jim's good pal of other days.

Needless to say, he makes his home with Jim and his ward. He soon suspects that Jim loves Dollie and soon his days and nights are restless agony at the big heroic guy that loves him. And Dollie loves him, too. Suddenly Frank comes on Jim as he is fondling the little frail Dollie locks the door, she was snatched from a watery grave, and the great truth dawns upon him. He decides that he is in the way, and leaves the house for parts unknown, where he finds only desolateness in when he finds Dolly weeping over the note Frank left.

Soldier Jim comes out, and overtakes Frank. He orders him to go back. Frank refuses, and begs Jim to let him go. Jim argues that Dollie loves him, and he must go back; Frank is obstinate, and Jim finally tells him, and pal Frank resumes his great work of life saving. Dives in, brings out he and Dollie are clasped in a lovers' embrace.

And out on the rocks alone, Jim looks to his heart that is broken, but there comes a ray of sunshine that the deep sea brought to him—only to sacrifice it on the altar of a greater love.

FOR THEIR MOTHER.—Alfred and Edmund, poverty stricken and their mother ill in bed, determine to go out and beg, but are quite unsuccessful—Alfred, a cripple, cannot walk about a large theater, but receive nothing for their pains. Each manner scrubs and they must devise some means of obtaining money. Alfred thinks.

The elder boy conceives a plan. He quickly sends his little brother to the bakery and strips the little fellow of most of his clothing, in order to make him look wretched; the then directs him to the theater and begs the passersby for alms. Sig from the sumptuously dining guests. At first the waiters endeavor to drive the lad away, but in so to prevent him from being patronized by the guests they leave him alone. His brother, who has been watching outside with the proper time arrives upon the scene and striking an attitude, hands the little brother the few cents he has, saying, "Take them to mother, she will help us all." The onlookers are both amused and touched at such a manly demonstration of kindness, and, not to be outdone by the lad, their attention upon the miserable little beggar. At last, the boys steer away toward their home, overjoyed. An old gentleman who has been observing the children, sees through their ruse, and follows them home. Finding out the circumstances, and the generous old fellow makes sure that the mother and children shall not be in want for some time to come.

THE BLUE NILE.—This beautiful film is a delightful excursion on the famous Blue Nile, among the ruins of Egypt, under the dazzling rays of the Egyptian sun. Picturesque race boats are seen skimming over the ripples natives, in their native costumes, are engaged now and then our attention is strangely arrested to the vividly reflected palm-trees, and cane foliage in the limpid surface of the mighty stream. Ambitious boys, on primitive craft made of cane off baksheesh, chase each other under the boats, shouting in the exhilaration of their fun, as they make hazardous dashes in and out among the temptuous paddle wheels and fleet craft. Then eyes then feast upon a gorgeous and most impressive sunset and the film ends in a grand silhouette of a "Mahari!"

pendicular under the Westerner, and he sees that he has made three mistakes in his shift. And these he valuables for he soon must go back to his home, and in the average demand that he will take a healthy sum from.

I see from a way as it speaks down. The eggeggeds and the ballons the adventure and to find him take his course for the home, pointing out the tones. When he reaches the end and he is landed. She is the young passenger to the end of that trip, pitifully it takes energy to accomplish by, and by some mishap, the traveller gets out of order between.

The same girl is hungry, and the execution man has to run with him. It is then as he laughs when one is hungry, and she sees therefore that the subsequent encounter may, is a very poor favorite indeed. So they go and catch, and the fact that the same scenarios are compelled to walk up and down stairs. But then a scene in a dining room.

Besides one instead the Westerner to get better acquainted, and accidents take his shift. The next day the bedding carriage has and when the young man enters the lower hall, he finds the place in flames and a panic-stricken crowd pouring out of the elevator. He dashes for the girl in vain. Then he discovers that she has remained to send in a fire alarm over the phone and that her association in the office had without her. The regular elevator man refuses to take the car up again. He says that the trip caused by smoke. But the Westerner sees an elevator man again, finds the girl unconscious, and carries her to safety.

Wasn't it natural that the girl should fall in love with her hungry suitor and marry him? Naturally she felt grateful to the man who had fed her when she was hungry and saved her life when she was dying. She really could not refuse to marry him, for he was very presentable, very much in earnest and very much in love.

THE POET OF THE PEOPLE.—Grengoire, a recent poet, feels keenly the wrongs of his people, who are terribly misused and ground down by the nobles of his day. He feels most keenly the fact that the king heeds not their cries for justice. He is a dreamer, not a practical man, and feels he can do nothing to help the people, except present their wrongs to them in such language that they themselves will be brought to a realization of their oppression, and will rise in their might and fight for justice.

One day, after having seen a poor old woman arrested in great haste, by a servant of the rich, Grengoire gathers the people of the streets about him, and reads them his poem entitled, "The King Insults Within Him." Soon after this takes place directly before the house of Annette, a beautiful girl, ward of the king. The king himself, Grengoire, happens to visit Annette and her father on this same day and notices the crowd before their house as he passes. When he sees Annette he proposes her consorting his inclinations, she tells him the crowd are listening to a poem called Grengoire, "The poet of the people." Being also interested this arouses his curiosity. The king's curiosity is aroused, and he orders Grengoire brought before him. The king then demands that Grengoire read his poems. Grengoire, knowing the king must be found guilty, unflinchingly he does not consent him of being the king himself, hesitates about reading verses against the king. He is, however, tempted by the offer of a good meal and as the poet is almost starving, he is induced to comply with the request.

The king is furious when he hears himself ridiculed from its verses and sentences Grengoire a arrest, and immediate execution. But he has become interested in the rugged poet, and as a last favor, promises to grant him any request he may name. Grengoire asks for an interview with Annette, whom he has long worshipped from afar, but he thinks, in his modesty, that she will refuse the king grants and Grengoire is brought to Annette's home. Here she entreats him to an interview with her in her own home. Grengoire, her harboring low condition of the people, and he speaks so eloquently, that not only does she consent his suit, but actually falls in love with the ragged poet himself.

Grengoire is led away by the executioner at the termination of his interview, and wonders hearts that he is to die, she pleads with all her might to the king for his pardon, confessing her own great love, and bringing the king to a realization of the fact that the poet poet meant good only, and that even his harsh judgment of the king and the nobles was, to a great extent, deserved by them. Just as the noose is being tightened around the unfortunate's neck, the king and Annette appear at the foot of the scaffold, and stopping the execution, the king grants Grengoire a full pardon, places his hand in that of Annette, and tells the crowd personally as witness to the ceremony that he can promise something much better—a wedding.

YANKEE.

A KENTUCKY GIRL.—Joe Bowers and Dave Hills are suitors for the hand of Madge Logan. Dave secures the girl's consent, and elopes in a sensible rage, sends a warning to the Revenue officers and describes the location of Dave's still, which is raided in due course of time. Dave is captured, but is discovered by Joe, who releases him. Dave, in his terror, runs away, and urges Joe to fight it out among the rocks, which he does, until his ammunition is exhausted. Then he is captured and jailed.

Madge is apprehended by a conversation with Dave of Joe's position. She quickly informs the boys, who, in a very sensational manner release Joe. After his rescue, Joe is forced to hide in the mountains, leaving his old Mammy to work out her living as best she can.

Madge, in the meantime, has been helping his mother in her toil. Joe has been longing for a sight of his Mammy and decides to go home and see her.

Dave has left the district for good to avoid capture. Joe of course, believes Dave to be still happy in his love for Madge and as the half-starved, care-worn boy reaches his home, great is his surprise to find Madge living with his mother and helping her with the work. The poor old lad grasps her son to her arms and tells him how good Madge has been to her. Joe looks longingly at Madge. "Hain't ye married to Dave yet?" Madge hangs her head and tells him she has been waiting for him. The boy's surprise knows no bound as he clasps her in his arms. Soon the storm that the Revenue officers have encountered lulls and a new life begins for Joe, Madge and Mammy.

ZELDA, THE GYPSY.—Mr. Hamilton was in a wildness with a son whom he expected to carry the business in case of his death. He fell in love with a widow, whose sole ambition was to inherit her husband's fortune. He had, however, to his left the bulk of his estate to his only son, Harry. Upon this merchant's death, the widow was deeply disgrined to learn that her expectations had not been realized. She determined to break the will and planned to carry out her intentions.

The unexpected visit of a tribe of Gipsies in the vicinity of their homestead, gave her a golden opportunity, which, however, ended disastrously to her. The "beauty" of the tribe was "Zelda," the fortune teller, who had become the wife of Emmanuel, the villain of the tribe, at a early age.

Harry becomes deeply impressed with Zelda and was encouraged by his step-mother in making clandestine appointments. Her designs were simple, as she succeeded in arousing the fierce jealousy of the unprincipled husband. Emanuel upbraids his wife, and threatens the life of her paramour and many startling surprises them in one of the secret love trysts. The young fellow endeavors to explain his interest in her and his reason for befriending her. All to no avail. He assaults the boy, and thinking he has killed him, makes his escape. Zelda gives the alarm and two farmers whom she notifies of the assault, come upon the scene and are soon joined by an infuriated mob who was vengeance on the murderous Gypsy. He in the mean time has fled to the Hamilton homestead, and breaking the lattice aside, bids Mrs. Hamilton to save him from his imminent danger. She now refuses to secrete him and thus shirks her compact.

The mob are seen coming into the grounds. He pleads with her for his life. She still refuses. He seizes her and in the struggle forces her to the balcony railing. The crowd below with shouts suppressed upon their lips, gaze upon the scene as they sway and are finally hung to the lawn below, an awful mass.

The lady who was only stunned in the encounter with the Gypsy, recovered sufficiently to reach the scene, hoping to save the life of the wretched Emeualie—too late. He comes upon the tragic scene, as his step-mother's body is borne away. Zenba shudders at the sight of Emeualie and is led from the scene by the equally afflicted admirer. Thus early in an unjust heritage paid the penalty that is so often meted out to the "wicked of heart," and the step-son remained free to make Zenba's life one of sunshine and happiness.

HIS WIFE.—Mrs. Graydon felt thoroughly put out with her daughter, Phyllis, for, urge her as she would, the girl absolutely refused to encourage either Edgar Bunce or Albert Manley. Both so desirable, too. At last, great to the old lady's joy, Allen declared that he, like Edgar, intended going away to forget the cruel Phyllis and his determination awakened that young woman to the fact that she loved him for she could not think of his leaving her, so within a few weeks they were married.

It was several months after this that Edgar returned home, and not having heard of Phyllis' marriage, again laid his heart at her feet, where he met first Mrs. Dennis's bill. Before the young lady had an opportunity of stopping him, Charles Partridge, who had been watching them, entered to her husband and told him of what he heard.

Ere he finished speaking, however, Edgar appeared, and but for Allen's intervention there might have been a serious quarrel, for so little did the husband mistrust his friend that as soon as Phyllis entered, he put the young man's name down for her next dance.

The next day found Edgar at Charle's office to demand an apology. Instead, he was thrown out by the latter's men. Edgar, however, was not to be so easily overcome. Waiting upon the corner until Charles came out, he again gave him an opportunity to apologize. In answer Charles struck a blow. This impertinence so angered Edgar that he drew his stick would have knocked Charles down but would have proven so serious had his head not struck a stone.

Believing that he had killed the young man, and seeing a crowd already collecting, he started round the corner. But as he looked back he saw the fascinating Nellie Stanley in a rage but he met was running, too, and he had scarcely time to dart around to Allen Stanley's side door, which he considered himself fortunate in passing at a time, when they turned the corner.

Mrs. Edgar dressed up to the front door, Allen could have thought nothing of it, but as he came at on his way to business he beheld his supposed dead standing around the house, and when the husband returned he heard the young man in Phyllis's room imploring her to secrete him in the closet. Instantly Charles Oldfield's warning given the ball came up before him.

He had no sooner burst in the door, however, are explanations were quickly made, so that ten the officers appeared for Edgar, it was Allen has protected it by declaring that he was alone.

THE COUNT OF NO ACCOUNT.—Henry Vetter, proprietor of the Schauer Hall, is at his office until the commencement of the stage and the crowds coming every day. THE COSSACK DUKE.—A lieutenant conceives a secret passion for the young wife of a general, who gradually becomes aware of the secret meetings and forbids the lieutenant his house. A heroism unwisely leads her help to make their hostages easier, and between the medium for the exchange of notes between the two. One of these is dropped and the duke comes to the conclusion that it is the wife with the lieutenant is bestowing his admiration upon. With the help of his secretary the duke blackens a plot against his supposed rival, who finds himself accused of conspiring against the Czar. The duke tells his wife of the lieutenant's condemned to be shot at once on pretense of the shock she knows the news will be to her young friend, and the duke puts the news concentration on her agitation. The lieutenant is about to be shot when the duke finds out that it is the wife of the general whom he has condemned to be done with, and gives the order that prevents the execution.

As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat any more since the

was installed.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2/3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

This G. E. Rectifier proved a source of interest to thousands of passers-by. The photograph was taken at night.

The rectifier draws the crowd to stop and look—and a nickel passes through to you.

With the rectifier, the films show on the screen white and unclouded—not yellow and foggy—why? because it makes D. C. out of A. C.

From all over the country we are receiving letters of commendation on G. E. Mercury Arc Rectifiers. It is the only device that satisfactorily transforms alternating current into direct current—the kind that gives a brilliant light and produces those clear, bright, sharp pictures that gain patronage. Moreover, the G. E. Mercury Arc Rectifier saves you money—one moving picture theatre manager advertising us that he has saved 50% on his current bills.

THE LIFE OF MOSES

When this standard five-reel subject was issued by the Vitagraph Company a little over a year ago, we printed in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD a descriptive reading for each reel, prepared by the Rev. Madison C. Peters. The demand for copies of the WORLD containing these readings have exhausted our supply, so we have reprinted them in pamphlet form.

This important Biblical series of pictures should never be presented without a lecture, and, to make this possible, we will supply the exhibitor with the complete set at the nominal price of Ten Cents, postage paid.

Mystery Solved!

"Gen. Flimco Is Crying Likell."

because he says "that man Laemmle has plotted and connived to ruin my business." A year ago the general was so strong that hundreds of exhibitors were afraid to run their own business. He told them that if they turned independent and the independent fight collapsed, they would be left high and dry. So they continued to pay him $2 a week. But the independent fight continued instead of collapsing, grew and grew and grew until now it is bigger than Gen. Flimco and his big brother combined. That's why he is crying likell and telling the teacher on Carl Laemmle. Here's a tip to licensed exhibitors:—Run any film you blame please AND YOUR LICENSE WILL NOT BE CANCELLED. Hundreds of theatres using licensed films are also using special releases not made by the trust and not a word is being said to them by Flimco. HE'S ALL BLUFFED OUT. He's lost his nerve. He's crying likell. And he places all the blame on yours truly,

Vol. 8 MAY 6, 1911 No. 18

Local Organization Necessary to a National Convention

For the success of a National Convention of any trade there must be some semblance of purpose. Something tangible behind the mere gathering together of a number of men, other than the aimless idea of talking business. The Convention should represent something, and before going further, it is well for someone to ask: What does the Convention represent? Offhand, it signifies a gathering of moving picture men to talk over matters of mutual interest. And again we ask: What moving picture men? Is it to represent all, or a part? If it represents a part, what part does it represent? These are questions which must be properly answered, before the project advances much further.

In our opinion, the basis upon which a National Convention must rest is the local organization, or Exhibitors' League. Now is the time when exhibitors in all cities of the Union should be up and doing in the matter of organization. There remain two months in which this very desirable state of affairs may well be perfected. Already there are a few well organized exhibitors' societies in existence. The Exhibitors' League of Ohio, is one of these that seems to be well-founded and supported. Within the past month the Exhibitors' League of New York City, has come into the lime-light, and shows commendable activity. There are more associations we could mention, but there are not enough by far.

Local organizations of moving picture men are very uncertain quantities. There are many reefs upon which the trailer craft have foundered. However, exhibitors' organizations, the main obstacles are within rather than without. Internal strife and dissension are the great drawbacks, instead of outside interference, as is commonly supposed. Regrettable squabbles over trivial questions have wrecked more than one exhibitors' League, and it is our purpose to call attention in this article, to some of the pitfalls that lie in the path of real and lasting organization.

The men who attend the Chicago convention should represent their local districts. Preferably they should come as delegates from well organized leagues, with certain duties to perform. In advance the organizations, here and there, should determine upon a programme to be followed out. It is quite certain that all questions will not be settled at the first convention. It is meet, then, that a definite programme should be mapped out, so that when the delegates of the various local associations arrive, they will know in advance exactly what matters of moment are to be considered, and will come prepared accordingly, and advocate the policies of the organizations which they represent.

Let us now get down to bed-rock, and begin at the beginning. Most local organizations of exhibitors are incongruous gatherings to say the least. In most every one of them there are to be found men of opposite types, tastes and ideas. This lack of homogeneity we have seen in so many cases that it is quite possible to designate or separate exhibitors into definite types, some of whom are far from being agreeable, and who furnish the obstacles in the way of perfect organization. Let us deal with these different types individually. By describing each type in a few words, we have no doubt that the reader will readily recognize them as they appear.

First, we have the jealous member. He will scarcely speak to his competitor across the street, or if he does it is but a few moments before the two of them are engaged in a heated argument, shaking their fingers under each others' noses while the others try to pacify them. Type No. 2—the member with a grudge. He has been nursing a grudge for a long time against certain exhibitors in the town. He is obstinate, while his fellows are endeavoring to point out to him the benefits of organization. He replies to them: "Go and talk to So-and-So—they are the people who put the business on the bum in this town, now let them straighten it out." Type No.

3—The haughty member. Usually he manages the largest theater in town. He considers himself in a class by himself and far above the smaller exhibitor. In many cases he refuses to join the movement, or if he does, he sends his doorman or someone else with no authority, to represent his house. Type No. 4—The don't care member. He is the man who is usually absent at roll-call, and when he does attend, has very little to say, except to give some lame excuse when asked why he has not paid his dues for the past three months. Type No. 5.—The foreign member. More often than not the heart of the foreign member is in the right place, but he is lost in a wilderness of words that he does not understand. He is usually very finicky about money matters, and many times, although he has signified his willingness to carry out the policy of the organization, he straightway returns to his theater and conducts things to suit himself. Type No. 6.—The talkative member. We all know him. The man who takes up the time of the members at the meeting with inconsequential and irrelevant interruptions. He usually has one or two "big" ideas that he would like to see carried out by those present, and will allow the members no rest until they take up his project. He is a pest. Type No. 7.—The suspicious member.- He is the man who has an idea that the whole thing is a frame-up for the benefit of one or two exhibitors, whom he imagines are running things to suit themselves. He says little until the meetings are over and the objects of his suspicion have taken a car homeward. Then he will voice his sentiments privately to one or two who linger with him. He gives them to understand that he is too wise to be taken in by any such game as they are trying to work on him. Type No. 8.—The loyal worker. There are a few men in every association who do the bulk of the work; they are tireless, honest and self-sacrificing. They spend much time that they can ill-afford upon correspondence, visiting obstreperous exhibitors, consulting with lawyers and politicians, neglecting their business for the good of some who do not seem to appreciate their efforts. This type is always buoyed up by hope, and never gives up until all the others have deserted.

To exhibitors in all cities, we would say that, for the benefit of the business as a whole, it is far better to lay aside all petty discord for the welfare of the business as a whole. Let them show to the world of trade that the retail moving picture business is as substantial and dignified as any other walk of trade. In a later article we shall have something more to say bearing upon local organization, the success of which must be the foundation of an Exhibitors' National Convention.

Pass It Along.

Defending the picture is an easy matter now as compared with earlier days. Skepticism is giving way to a general recognition of the merits of motography. The public is becoming more interested in the subject day by day, and it reads with avidity the increasing amount of favorable newspaper comment pertaining thereto. Very often we place a copy of The World in the hands of professional or business men in other lines and it is quite gratifying to observe the pleasure they seem to take in reading it.

In this way we have won a large number of converts in men who were apathetic in their attitude toward the picture. As every good picture man is expected to be militant in advancing the business, we would suggest to our thousands of readers that they loan their copy of The World to such laymen as would be considered desirable converts to the picture. The amount of good to be done thereby would be incalculable. We realize that it would not be feasible to circulate the weekly issue as though it were a library book, but we do think that if each exhibitor would lend it to the local newspaper editors it would be as bread cast upon the waters.

The Studio Wedding

"Backward, turn backward, oh time in thy flight—
Make me a child again, just for tonight!"

As though in supplement to our editorial in last week's issue on the subject of Moving Pictures in the Home, there appeared accounts, a few days since, in the New York press of a silver wedding that was given by Mr. and Mrs. Lionel Sutro of New York City. The feature of this silver wedding, that attracted the Metropolitan press to the extent of considerable space, was a moving picture. Mr. and Mrs. Sutro were married 25 years ago, when there were no moving pictures; therefore it was impossible for them to show to their assembled guests a true delineation of their wedding or their courtship days. Nothing daunted, however, they resolved to make the best of what was at hand by rehearsing their courtship days before the moving picture camera. In a measure their moving picture was a make-shift, but they did the best they could under the circumstances, and proved thereby that although they may be growing old, at least they are not becoming antiquated. They have, moreover, set an example that we expect to see followed as a general practice in the not far distant future.

Quite a few months ago, THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD predicted that in the days to come there will be more studio weddings than church weddings, but to the best of our information it has remained with such enterprising old folks as Mr. and Mrs. Sutro to actually show the way for young brides and bridegrooms.

In our editorial of last week on the subject of The Moving Picture in the Home, we indicated that the moving picture portrait would be the connecting link between cinematography and the home. The film record of weddings very properly comes under the head of moving picture portraits. It is a record of an event in the family. In most cases, from now on, it will actually depict the foundation of the family, which, as time goes on, will be augmented by further additions to the growing negative as children are born to the couples who have been filmed. These children will of course, when home cinematography becomes a fad, be recorded in moving pictures at different periods of their growths, or at various chapters in their lives, such as, at graduation time, the first long dress or trousers, the engagement, the courtship, and so on, until they are married, when new records of the childrens' childrens' marriages will be made, while in the meantime the original bride and groom have become grandparents. Then history will begin to repeat itself by suppling each member of the family with a print of the foundation of the family, and so on it may continue for centuries.

The moving picture will be the future family tree; it will discount heraldry by 95%. The time is at hand; the question is: "Who will be the first to equip a large studio on Fifth Avenue with special reference to the accommodation of weddings." The field is large and promising. No doubt the money classes will be the first to take it up as a serious proposition. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD takes this opportunity to congratulate Mr. and Mrs. Sutro upon their pioneer work for the moving picture portrait. They have set an example. They have blazed a new trail for the moving picture and have thereby shown to the world once more that the moving picture will be with us forever and a day.

The Exhibitor and the Lighting Company

If there is any person or persons any more independent than a small town baggage-master, exhibitors will no doubt agree that it is a public service corporation. Many are the tales of arrogance and high-handed independence of the electric lighting concerns that supply current to the exhibitor as well as the entire city in which the plant is located. Electric lighting, like the telephone, is by nature a monopoly. It would be difficult to get efficient service were city lighting not controlled from one central point. But that is all the more reason why a curb should be put upon it. The business of lighting a city is by far too much power to be placed absolutely in the hands of arbitrary individuals, especially as they show signs of beginning to dabble in politics, because, once firmly entrenched by means of political patronage, their position is well nigh impregnable, and the consumer is practically at their mercy.

We have been noticing a case in Brooklyn recently where an exhibitor of moving pictures has carried on single-handed a legal battle with the Edison Illuminating Company, and his success in getting an injunction against that haughty corporation for refusing to furnish him light. This man not only secured an injunction, but the judge who granted it took occasion to score the Edison Company in very round terms for their arbitrary conduct, and besides awarded the exhibitor a judgment of $130 damages and the cost of his suit to recompense him for being obliged to keep his theater closed for four nights.

In this case it appears that the Edison Company conceived the idea that Mr. Rosen, the exhibitor, was interested in another theatre that was owing them a bill for service. They had no proof that the plaintiff was financially interested in one or two other concerns they named, but acted upon the supposition that he was, and refused point blank to furnish him current unless he made good the arrears of another theatre.

There is nothing unusual in this case. It is well known that electric light companies have arbitrary ways of refusing installations and service until some other old bill of someone's else is paid up. It is not infrequent to hear that a man is denied service because he has a brother who is indebted to the power company for service. These corporations sometimes over-step their legal rights and make a family affair of a strictly business proposition. We are glad to record the case of Rosen vs. The Edison Illuminating Company, because it shows that a single individual has brought about a result which, so far, has been accomplished by few, if any, of the now existing Exhibitors' Associations. The question of electric light current is one which should be a paramount issue in all Exhibitors' Associations, as it should be with the contemplated Exhibitors' National Convention to be held in Chicago during July of this year.

We will pass over the high price of electricity in a few words, as everyone of us knows that in most communities it is exhorbitant. Many exhibitors have submitted and are yet submitting to the exorbitant rates of electric power companies, and regard it as the least of their troubles in comparison with their subserviency to dictatorial mandates of electric power corporations.

Exhibitors, however, are beginning to realize that, in many cases, they can manufacture their own power at a low cost and sell the surplus at a profit. We have in mind one small theatre in Newark that generates electricity on the premises. The public service corporation is common with all such corporations, by virtue of their affiliations with politics, have long ago passed laws depriving others than themselves of the right to string a wire across a public street. This, as one can readily see, is the mainstay of their monopolistic scheme. There will be found, no doubt, other laws of the same nature should one have any litigation with them. One feature, however, they have been unable to circumvent, and that is to prohibit electric service within the confines of a square block. The Newark exhibitor in question has, for some time, been supplying not only himself with electricity, but others in the same block who desire it, at about half the rate of the public service corporation, and direct current at that.

The foregoing is offered to our readers as a suggestion. Electric current for the moving picture theatre may be had for the mere trouble of operating a dynamo, provided the exhibitor is enterprising enough to extend service, throughout the block in which he is situated, to the tradesman in different lines. There have appeared, as are advertised in the columns of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, electric lighting plants of moderate cost that have been found to meet all the requirements of moving picture theaters. The reports we hear from them are that they give entire satisfaction, and many are being installed in small cities where electric current of any kind is not available. The testimonials of their efficiency leave little room for doubt.

This matter of current for moving picture theatres is one which is important enough to come up for considerable deliberation at the forthcoming convention.

Mayor Gaynor's Committee.

The ladies of the Woman's Club have decided to petition the Town Council of Montclair, N. J., to grant no license to show motion pictures in that village. No other comment can be made on this decision save that it shows an attitude toward moving pictures not uncommon in such organizations. Women of culture are fortunately apt to be conservative. Useful innovations, though at first they seem harmful to them, find staunch supporters in them when once they recognize their value.

Professor Frederick Starr, of the University of Chicago, is reported recently to have said:

"The moving picture is not a makeshift, but the highest type of entertainment in the history of the world. It stands for a better Americanism because it is attracting millions of the masses to an uplifting institution, drawing them to an improving as well as an amusing feature of the city life. Its value cannot be measured now, but another generation will benefit more largely through its influence than we of today can possibly realize."

The value of the motion picture to modern civilization is growing more and more widely recognized every day. We believe that the pictures that are shown to the growing generation should be wisely regulated. They will affect our national character, but if sanely directed they will work for our good. But the first place that the authorities in any community should look for information to help them in decisions regarding the regulation of moving picture shows should be among representative exhibitors and managers of such shows.

Mayor Gaynor has appointed a committee to co-operate with the aldermen in drawing the new ordinances for the regulation of the moving picture business in the city, recommended in a recent report by Commissioner of Accounts Fosdick. The committee is composed of Michael Furst, a Brooklyn lawyer, John Collier, of the People's Institute, Assistant Corporation Counsel Cornell, attached to the Mayor's office, Maurice Wertheim, of 49 West 72d Street, and Dr. J. F. Warhaime, of Brooklyn.

Not a man on this committee of five is affiliated with the motion picture business. It is a friendly committee, however.

Fishing for Compliments.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

The man who uses his strength and energy in making his way gets used to rough treatment and can stand for a little broad-minded criticism without getting peevish. But some of the gentlemen who are now eating riz de veau a la financiere as a steady diet are becoming so delicate that anything said to them must be served with a nice, juicy dressing.

Of course it is as plain as the wart on your nose that indiscriminate praise of photoplays is of no value to the producers, and it is equally obvious that exhibitors must be sickened by the continuous stream of flattery poured out by organs of this or that company on what is served in the way of plays whether palatable or rotten.

In the interest of all concerned, for the permanent establishment of moving pictures in public favor, particularly to draw intelligent people all over the country into the little theatres, we might as well face the fact that 75 per cent. of photoplays are not what they should be.

There is a reason.

But let us see whether such a statement is justified.

Instead of illuminating this point with our own criticisms, and in a spirit of impartiality, I will cite the views of a contemporary published last week.

I do not know the critic personally, not even his name, but he seems to be fair. He states in his first review of the week's releases that a Licensed film story had been already produced by an Independent company. Later he condemns an Independent release as a serious detriment to the entire motion picture industry.

I have carefully examined his 54 criticisms, and eliminating films openly or silently condemned and those damned with faint praise, I find that he comes out in frank approval of 5 out of 31 Licensed films, as follows:

Opportunity and the Man (Lubin), "Strong and purposeful;" The Court Martial (Gaumont), "A strong and gripping story;" Silver Threads among the Gold (Edison), "A simple, appealing and poetic thought;" Though Your Sins Be as Scarlet (Vitagraph), "Probably the strongest and most effective subject of a biblical character yet issued by any company;" Eastern Babies (Vitagraph), "A particularly pleasing hit."

Of 4 out of 23 Independent releases, he says:

A Good Cigar (Imp), "A capital idea brought out with wonderful cleverness;" Velvet and Rags (Thanhouser), "An appealing little story;" The Little Major (Rex), "Altogether the most delightful, touching and impressive picture dealing with child life;" The Fall of Troy (Itala), "Absorbing picture from a dramatic point of view."

Nine out of 54 releases are given unqualified praise, or less than 25 per cent., so I may not be far out of the way in stating that 75 per cent. of contemporaneous releases could stand a raise of quality with a margin to spare.

Oscar Hammerstein says that the making of an operatic star is 50 per cent. art and 50 per cent. advertising, and these proportions might apply to the making of a photoplay. The business end is undoubtedly an important one now and was the more important in times gone by, but the artistic end is becoming of greater consequence every day. The production of a stage play is composite. Authorship, acting, stage management, and the discriminating judgment of an art director all enter into the general result. So also with the photoplay, but that play must be of value to start with before the combined efforts of studio force and office force are devoted to its production and sale, if it is to be a success.

What proportion of general outlay goes for film stock, salaries, rentals, equipment, scenes and settings, advertising and general running expenses, if it costs $3,000 to manufacture and sell fifty reels of one photoplay?

Ninety-nine per cent?

Does the play cost $30, or 1 per cent.?

Would it not be sound business policy to lop a few dollars off elsewhere, and pay $50 for the play itself, to call forth superior efforts from the author and enlist the support of professional writers now made indifferent because of the comparatively low figure offered for scenarios?

Is it not better sense to get good plays in the variety demanded by the audiences than to look for praise where it is not deserved?

There is no need of assuming an injured air if a release fails to call out generous commendation; better make an examination of the scenario department. It will be a revelation to many producers honestly trying to give the exhibitor the best money can buy to find that scenarios which have cost their authors hours and days if not weeks of hard work are allowed to lie unexamined, are sent back in a shape in which consigned goods should never be returned or are "lost" in an astonishing number of cases considering how carefully Uncle Sam runs the P. O. Department.

It would be better for every one concerned in the business if an intelligent effort was made to get high-class plays by paying for them. Authors would certainly take greater pains if assured of adequate recompense promptly paid on acceptance with fair treatment in case MSS are not available, such treatment in fact as they receive from reputable publishers. High-class plays, those which are not only strong in dramatic interest or lively with humorous situation or replete with tender sentiment, which not only stir the emotions but contain some meaning which will make them live in memory, are making moving pictures the greatest art discovered in long centuries. Such plays provide actors and actresses with what is required to call out the best there is in them—opportunity—they give an intelligent or ambitious director the sort of material he needs to show that he is not slighting his department, and they are really the starting point of the whole business if it is to be one of lasting success. Imagine, therefore, an author of ability and self-respect, making a careful study of his subject, revising and perfecting his scenario for days or even weeks, and presenting it in such shape that it can be performed as written, only to have his MS lost, stolen, torn, defaced, or even accepted and paid for at current rates!

"Gravy may be used to cover poor quality, but a good dish, well served, sets better on the stomach."

NEWS BRIEFS.

Winona, Miss.—Mr. A. L. Howard has leased the Opera House, which has a seating capacity of 400. He has installed Powers' machine and equipment, and will run only moving pictures.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Drury Theater, 13th and Tioga Streets, is, to all appearances, a very progressive moving picture house. They have sent us samples of their advertising in local newspapers which are quite as elaborate and cover as much space as any theater or circus has ever been wont to do. The Drury Theater is devoted to moving pictures only, vaudeville was banished from there ten months ago. Nevertheless the proprietors, Messrs. M. F. Cullen and J. G. Conway, inform us that there was no drop in their business on that account and that they are filling their large seating capacity of 960 every day with the use of exclusively Independent service.

The Lyric Potoplay

By Hanford C. Judson.

It is a far more difficult undertaking for a playwright to bring a sentimental situation home to spectators of a motion picture than it is for him to make a melodramatic or a comic situation plain to them. To make a love scene effective in a photoplay takes very sincere acting. Scenes showing mother-love are more easily pictured, for everybody expects a mother to love her child. But we who are older know that friendship and the love of a man and a woman may be shallow, even when vehemently expressed. So, if the maker of a motion picture can hit upon any means of heightening the suggestion of heart-felt emotion in such scenes, he is fortunate.

Two or three recent photoplays have shown that very effective means to this end may be found in the dramatic use of some good, old song, which expresses, lyrically, the same feeling that the photoplay, dramatically, trys to suggest. When a skilful musician follows such a photoplay, the audience continually receives suggestions of the same emotion from piano and picture. The effect is doubled.

No dramatic situation presented to us on the stage pleases us till we feel it. It must make us glad, or sad, or brave or religious before we like it. The mind translates the situation that is pictured to us into feeling. Song comes more close to us. It speaks directly to us of our own experience. Every good song is, as it were, the disembodied soul of a drama, but it is our very own drama, our own experience that it sings. When we sing a song we become the actors, not the spectators of the drama. So, whenever a good song can be wedded to a photoplay, the marriage will be a happy one.

Nearly all the songs that have made a strong appeal to the people are simple. Poets are also inclined to be optimistic. Even when their songs are pensive, they carry an atmosphere of consolation. These two qualities, simplicity and healthfulness, are of the greatest importance. True poets are at heart very much like children and their best songs are perhaps the most effective things we have in keeping the world young, fresh and happy. Such songs appeal to all kinds of people and the love and respect that their authors' win is a recognition of their value to mankind. Any photodrama that is written to be played with the well-remembered music of one of these songs and that adequately expresses, in a dramatic way, the same sentiment as the song is likely to enjoy a long popularity.

Good songs are very few. No mean or small soul ever wrote a truly good song. No thin-hearted scenario writer, however great his intelligence, will ever understand a good song deeply and sincerely enough to make a photoplay that will be fit to go with it. An insincere scenario writer, is abomination. Even the best and most gifted writer, in most cases, will have an exceedingly hard job to illustrate dramatically a song voicing the emotions of real human life. Such are so simple and so true, that any actions that well serve to represent them must be surely human.

These thoughts were suggested primarily by a very good photoplay written to go with the music of the song, "Silver Threads among the Gold," and at the same time to illustrate it dramatically. The melody supplied by the musicians as the play progressed interpreted and, what is more important, gave character to the scenes in such a way that the play, as presented, became intensely dramatic. This play, because of its sincerity and simplicity, is not only in its action, but in its setting and in the interpretation that the actors gave it, and because it was followed intelligently—and this was also an important factor—by the musicians in Keith & Proctor's Union Square Theatre, was a thing of beauty as well as an effective drama.

In our town lived William Jones.
He'd lived there all his life;
We stood to offer sympathy,
When poor Bill took his wife

(Bill hadn't given her a rest in three years and her clothes were a sight. She beat it with a fellow who rather resented seeing patent medicine.)

But Bill, he got as guessing some.
He didn't say her ways
Were natural—certain outcome of
Her love for picture plays!

(The Pressagent of the Little Doers said 'twas no use 'letter to the Ladies Misdemeanant. Bill's wife had been observed to pause and look at a poster of the Parson Play, in front of the Daydream, only five months before.

Then Bill's boy Jack, he ran away
To sea he wished to go,
And Bill denied the obvious—
A motion picture show!

(The boy had been asked for reading "The Young Hero of the Forecastle, or, The Romancer's Glorious Homecoming," during school hours. He got the book at the public library.

And Bill, he robbed a widow's house,
He even struck a child,
And didn't say 'twas all brought on
By pictures weird and wild!

(Bill would have shot if forced to spend a nickel just to look at something, when he could get a perfectly good beer for that sum.)

We knew then he was loony, so
They loaded him with chains,
And shipped him to the foolish-place,
Where William still remains.

(Just before Bill was brought into court his fellow was beat up wife half to death just over some picture-play thing, and the Judge wiped his eyes and said we were heroes and he keep away from those horrible places. He said never been to one himself, but he knew they must be terrible to cause a man to beat his own wife.)

While in his cell Bill sits, he sings—
The Keeper's tears do flow—
"Don't blame all things you get caught at Upon a picture show!"

(The keeper wears because he isn't sufficiently educated like us to work up Bill's escape one function—those who see only want we could think of to throw with "Sure.")

"Oh, should they get you dead to rights
And prove you weak and mean,
Don't whine beeatse it's fashionable
"Them pictures on the screen."

(Say, just between us two, wouldn't you? I used to have some that made me so I'd be ashamed to be seen. Afraid of myself. Oh, nobody said white slaves, gun-toting cow-punchers, three cheering days for the good guy, murder, robbery, forgery, and a dozen thing more, but—when you've seen a certain picture of an unmentionable kind.)

You should let Bill's fate warn you, child
The poor old crazy jay—
You take this tip—blame your misdeeds
Upon a ghost-play!

E. Mawby Allman, Ph.D.

The Cook Co. of "The Truth About the Pole" will soon take up the Mystic Man's Cook Book—found left behind in the Wreck. Mr. Wilbert Melville has made the pictures and with them and portraits of him just completed arrangements with the Gaumont Company for the exploitation in Canada and Europe and is about to close a deal for its exploitation in South America. The American market is being looked after by the North Pole Pictures Company, of Chicago, a company organized by Mr. Melville for the purpose of placing the picture in this market. Its success has been marked and Mr. Cook has been so much impressed by the artistic and business ability of the manager, Wilbert Melville, that he has appointed Mr. Melville as his general manager in charge of the New York office, located in the Metrolite building, from which point Mr. Melville will attend to all details connected with the forthcoming publication of Dr. Cook's book entitled "My Attainment of the Pole," as well as look after the rest of Dr. Cook's personal appearance.

Swelling the Box Office Receipts.

Beginning a Series of Practical Articles Devoted to a Subject of the Greatest Interest to Theater Owners, Managers and Ambitious Employees.

By George Rockhill Craw.

(First Article)

Practically considered, the supreme test of the successful management of a film theater is the box office receipts. In my articles relating to the technique of the picture play, I have tried to show the necessity of structure in the art of building a drama. No doubt many of you have said that those articles were for the producer and scenario writer, but if you have chanced to read them, you will, after reading the present series on "Swelling the Box Office Receipts," be surprised to learn how much the well built drama has to do with the well built business, gaged by its receipts.

But before we get to the matter of profitable film selection, there are other considerations that I shall treat in their regular order, along the lines of the following structure, which embraces the elements that effect the receipts of the box office:

- WELFARE
  - Sanitation
  - Ventilation
  - Fire Protection
- COMFORT
  - Foyer Arrangement
  - Seating Arrangement
  - Theater Lighting
  - Temperature
- ENTERTAINMENT
  - Film Selection
    - Judgment
    - Variety
  - Projection
    - Clearness
    - Tempo
  - Music
    - Instrumental
    - Vocal
  - Vaudeville
    - Fitness
    - Variety
- ADVERTISING.
  - Lobby Display
    - Posters, Photos, Etc.
  - Souvenirs
  - Announcements
    - Screen
    - Posters
    - Circulars
    - Cards
    - Form Letters
    - Newspaper Ads.

    (Best methods of preparation, distribution, etc.)

The foregoing diagram may be gone over carefully by you and the points upon which you know yourself to be weak, noted with a view to an improvement of them in your own theater, wherever possible.

THE WELFARE OF THE AUDIENCE.

Sanitation, good ventilation and adequate fire protection are three things that are absolutely essential to the welfare of the audience as well as to the theater's own personnel, from usher to owner. It is not the purpose of this article to point to the moral responsibility that should prompt a scrupulous regard for such welfare, although such a responsibility is a heavy one, but to show how such a regard will affect box office receipts favorably.

Some theaters have their homes over cellars that have not been cleaned nor disinfected for years. The very condition of the cellar causes the theater owner to close the door upon it in disgust and despair. But he has only shut the skeleton in its closet, and its phantom will cause him more loss than any "ghost" that ever troubled him upon his screen, and like the screen wraith, the quicker it is "laid," the better it will be for the box office.

A peculiar musty smell pervades the theater. The air is close and foul. It is only too evident that what is needed is ventilation. The theater man installs parlor electric fans which stir up the air and reduce the temperature a degree or so, but which do not improve the ventilation. What is needed is a proper fresh air intake and outlet, together with a revolving fan propeller powerful enough to ventilate the theater thoroughly.

The theater owner, seeking an effective ventilator, installs such a system at comparatively small cost, and while there is an improvement, the "ghost" from the cellar with its graveyard smell, still walks the theater. Grown people begin to comment upon the unhealthy visitor, and begin to give the place a wide berth, and as rama nihil est celerius mothers forbid their children to enter the play house, and the little ones go to the photoplay further up the street, "where the air is better," although by this time, the owner himself has become so used to the "ghost" that he does not notice it, and attributes his loss of business to other causes.

What he should have done in the first place was to have cleaned out his cellar, using both disinfectants and deodorizers, for a deodorizer while destroying evil odors will not kill the germs that accompany them.

If the cellar was not included in his lease, he should have insisted that the parties responsible for it should give it a thorough cleansing. Upon their refusal to do so, he should have complained to the proper civil authorities, such as the board of health. Then after removing the cause of the "ghost" he should have eliminated it entirely from his auditorium by use of a reliable disinfectant and deodorizer.

Even where cellars or neighboring stores are not to blame for odors, theaters should disinfect thoroughly, and though there is no apparent need (there is always a need), systematic disinfection should take place. It is not only a good talking point for use in the advertising of the theater in order to get new business, but it will help to hold what you have, and bring back those who have been weaned away by houses using the latest sanitary precautions.

BAD AIR AND THE BOX OFFICE.

The odor creeping up from an old cellar is perhaps not so disagreeable as foul air caused by a lack of proper ventilation. There is, in fact, no more baleful influence on box office receipts than bad air in the auditorium. Of course there are exhibitions at which the auditorium is filled, because of its being the time of day for a naturally large attendance, but it is at the times of naturally lesser attendance that the loss is felt.

Good ventilating devices such as revolving fans, properly installed, for expelling foul air, should be placed in all theaters having poor ventilation.

One may wonder why of two theaters equally good as to pictures and music, one has a popular vogue and the other a slender patronage, both being in the same neighborhood. The chances are ten to one that poor ventilation and sanitation are at the bottom of the losing theater's troubles.

But suppose the losing house cleans up its cellar, sprays its floors, and becomes sweet and clean; suppose it installs proper ventilating devices and now has pure and delightful air, even distancing its successful rival in its hygiene, will its box office receipts then equal those of the rival house?

Not unless the new improvements have been properly advertised not only to the people who may become patrons, but to the people who are patrons and to those who were patrons, but who were driven away by the theater's former hygienic flaws. Mere announcements in the theater's street lobby and on its screen are not enough. The entire neighborhood must be covered with neat announcements, properly delivered, regarding the new improvements in the theater, and attention called to the purity and sweetness of the air now circulating in its auditorium.

It is not my purpose yet to go into the best and most economical methods of theater advertising. That will come later on in this series, but I hope I have made it clear that the elements in a theater's success depend one upon the other, and that to make one effective, all must be made as perfect as possible, for just as the success of a theater's advertising may depend upon its provisions for the welfare of the audience, so do these provisions depend upon the advertising to make themselves effective in influencing maximum box office receipts.

City and town ordinances in most cases take care of what should be done to protect theater audiences from fire casualty, and where the executive officers are lax, the theater can observe no better policy than to comply with the law voluntarily. It is needless to say that numerous, prominently marked "Exits," together with a display of practicable hose and extinguishers, help greatly in the establishing of confidence in the safety of a theater.

In the matter of comfort in a theater, much must often be sacrificed to necessity, but comfort is a strong factor in the building up of box office receipts. The matter of temperature should be entirely under the control of the management. Drafts should be guarded against by proper door arrangement and an even temperature should maintain. It seems better to have the temperature low than too warm, as few persons remove their wraps when attending the photoplay. In summer the only regulation to be had is through ventilation and air circulation. It is up to the rotary ventilators and the electric fans.

There is nothing that will keep some people away from a photoplay more than having to stand in the rain or cold while waiting to hand their tickets in at the door of the auditorium. Wise theater builders will make their foyers large enough to shelter the waiting crowds, and those owners who are already established, and who can spare the room, will find an alteration that will permit of this, highly profitable. Many persons pass a theater by, because of a waiting line, whereas, if the line were sheltered from view until such persons had purchased their tickets and been admitted to the foyer, they would attend the show. On the other hand it may be argued that an outside waiting line advertises the prosperity of a theater, and is, therefore, a good thing. I, for one, do not believe so, as there are better ways to advertise a theater than at the expense of the comfort of its patrons. The line to my mind, should be sheltered from outside view as well as from the weather.

Many theaters have leased quarters, in good locations from a business point of view. Yet these rooms are too small to admit of proper comfort facilities and at the same time leave room for a profitable seating capacity. In such cases the rooms leased have been the only available quarters in the coveted locality. Even the smallest theaters should be specially planned and built for their own particular purpose and in time the old store-room photoplays will be a thing of the past.

The result of the old order has been bad from a point of comfort and decency. Here the rows of seats are so close together that entrance and exit are made at the greatest inconvenience, both to those in the seats and to those going out and coming in. Besides the discomfort, there is an element of indecency in the enforced contact of limbs, which keeps many ladies from attending a theater without decent and comfortable clearance between its rows of chairs. Wide aisles also add to the comfort and convenience of the audience in entering and leaving the house, while the chairs should not be too narrow, and should have wires beneath for hats. Even so little a thing as hat wires have their part in creating a feeling of satisfaction and comfort in a theater's patrons.

The proper lighting of a theater is another factor in the comfort of an audience. People do not enjoy walking down dark aisle and groping about for seats. Besides, the newspapers have campaigned bitterly against dark theaters on the ground that such lighting, or rather the lack of lighting, breeds indecency. Thus, to many, the dark theater suggests an improper one, and the thought is reflected in the receipts at its box office.

To sum up, I will say that theaters should do their utmost in the interest of the welfare of their audiences. There is no excuse for poor ventilation and sanitation in these days of mechanical ventilators and excellent disinfectants. Alterations, looking to the comfort of the audience are not so costly made, but all that is possible should be done. Finally, no money spent for welfare and comfort improvements will be quickly returned at the box office window if such improvements are announced through systematic methods of publicity.

The newest idea in slides is that exploiting the various favorite Independent players, giving their best portraits on slides and thus familiarizing Independent picture-goers with the faces. Picture patrons, like others, have their favorites and often a slide with a photo of a favorite, announcing that he is in as "coming," will bring the patrons back to the show. Thus the "photoslide," as this latest slide novelty is called, is a certain builder of that most desirable thing—steady patronage—and is worth many times the very small sum asked by its makers, the Independent Photoslide Company, Room 207, 147 Fourth Avenue, New York City. Write them for further information.

James Young Deer.

The picture personality presented herewith is that of James Young Deer, director and general manager of the Pathe West Coast Studio. Although an old-timer in the moving picture field, Mr. Young Deer, as will be seen from his photograph, is still a comparatively young man in point of years. Young Deer was born in Dakota City, Neb. Ever since childhood his life has run in amusement channels. For many years he trouped all over the country with the circuses of the period, among them being Barnum & Bailey, and 101 Ranch. Early in the '90's when the moving picture industry began to forge to the front, Young Deer left the lure of the circus for the spotlight of the moving picture camera. Although he little realized it at the time, the moving picture field was destined to provide the medium for the outlet of his dramatic instincts. His first experience in the pictures occurred under Kalem management, where his past experience stood him in good stead. It was at this period that the popular Western and Indian pictures came into vogue. Young Deer then left the Kalem Company and joined the Lubin forces, where he helped to put on "The Fallen Arrow," and other Lubin films. Beside assisting in the production of the films, he wrote many of the scenarios on which they were based, and oftimes played the leading roles or important character parts. His work in Western pictures attracted the attention of the Biograph management, who engaged his services in "The Mended Lute," a beautiful Biograph production. From the Biograph he joined the Vitagraph and helped to produce the Vitagraph film "Red Wing's Gratitude."

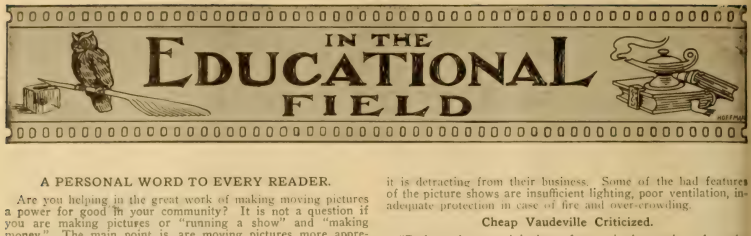
When Pathe Freres began producing in this country he affiliated himself with that company, being one of their first American producers. Among the films that he produced for them in the East were "The Cheyenne Brave," "The Red Girl and the Child," and a War drama, "Under Both Flags."

Shortly afterward he returned to Los Angeles to establish the Pathe West Coast Studio. His locally produced Western pictures have been very successful and are much in demand. Young Deer has gathered about him a competent organization of professional men and women and is sparing neither effort nor expense to make the Pathe Freres productions topnotchers in the film market. Among his productions so far have been the films "The Yaqui Girl," "The Cowboy's Devotedness," "Lieutenant Scott's Narrow Escape," "Red Deer's Devotion," "A Western Courtship," and others.



A PERSONAL WORD TO EVERY READER.

Are you helping in the great work of making moving pictures a power for good in your community? It is not a question if you are making pictures or "running a show" and "making money." The main point is, are moving pictures more appreciated as a result of your efforts? What is your reputation, and the reputation of your place, if you are an exhibitor? What do your neighbors and the authorities say about you and your exhibition? These are straight yet pertinent questions, the answer thereto proves whether you are helping or hindering the good work of moving pictures that satisfy. If you and your pictures are "yellow" you will not stay in the business long. If you and your pictures are "true blue" be ready for that approval which means prosperity. If you are of the latter class this little dissertation is to help you; the days of the mediocre are passed, these are the days of the finished product equal to the times; further advancements will be made in equal stages as time goes on. There is an educational value in all good moving picture work, and unless you are in this school you will very soon prove that no matter in what branch of cinematographic art you are interested, you must either keep pace or be left behind.

Public taste is sensitive, critical, yet safe, public knowledge, however, is not as far advanced as its taste; in some things it knows little in others it knows nothing; this ignorance and prejudice it is incumbent upon all interested in good work to dispel. Do you ask in what way you can help? the answer is the usual one of "printer's ink." Much of the lack of moving picture knowledge among the general public is because they do not read anything which may enlighten them; remember very few of them read this, your trade paper; consequently they have not the advantage that you have. This defect may, however, be readily overcome, if you loan your copy to the publishers of your local paper, call their attention to the articles, asking them to reproduce some of them in their editions. It might be worth your while to have some of your local authorities constantly reading the Moving Picture World. They would be enlightened you cannot but admit; the result would be to drive away much prejudice, increase true sympathy, secure greater encouragement and so raise the standard of public sentiment, by the propaganda of such an educational nature. Remember lack of knowledge means lack of interest; legitimate acquaintance means support, and knowledge is power. Would you especially succeed you must not be a "stand patter," but a "progressiveist" in everything pertaining to cinematography and its educational advancement.

EDUCATIONAL VALUE OF MOVING PICTURES DISCUSSED BY AUTHORITIES.

The probability of moving pictures being introduced in our public schools as a means of educating children and the declaration that they have tremendous power for good in any community provided they are of a moral character, were brought out last night by Justice Robert J. Wilkin, of the Children's Court, and Dr. J. P. Warbasse, at the regular meeting of the Monday Club of Brooklyn.

"Moving Picture Shows" was the subject under discussion. Dr. Warbasse first gave an interesting talk on the subject, after which Justice Wilkin led a discussion in which a number of members, representing many institutions and associations interested in charitable work, participated.

Dr. Warbasse gave it as his opinion that much of the prejudice which has grown up against moving picture shows is largely unfounded. He considers them an institution of great educational value. That they are money making is indicated by the fact that about 5,000,000 persons attend these shows in the United States daily. Clergymen in many cities have recognized their value and introduced them in their churches giving vivid presentations of religious themes.

Dr. Warbasse admitted there is a state of chaos existing in the legal aspect of the moving picture business. Seven city departments are constantly pestering the proprietors of these places to meet the requirements demanded of regular theaters, the proprietors of which are antagonistic to the new enterprise because it is detracting from their business. Some of the bad features of the picture shows are insufficient lighting, poor ventilation, inadequate protection in case of fire and over-crowding.

Cheap Vaudeville Criticized.

"Perhaps the most iniquitous feature is the music and vaudeville which many of the establishments provide," he said. "They are in the main only cheap, silly acts, and have no relation to the great moving picture enterprise. In regard to the practice of some proprietors in admitting minors to witness the pictures, the law prohibiting this should be more strictly enforced. And then there is a lack of uniform laws governing the shows," he concluded.

Justice Wilkin said the people cannot expect the large number of boys and girls who frequently enter the darkened halls where in picture shows are given to be angels. The darkened halls of many of these theaters are a bad feature of the business, but the character of some of the pictures presented is probably a worse and more detrimental feature. Still he believed the motion pictures have come to stay and have a great field and a bright future.

In fact, he expressed the belief that the time is not far off when they will be introduced in our public schools as a means of aiding in the education of children. He suggested that a board of public censors be appointed composed of persons who would be responsible to the public and that their duty should be to regulate the business in all its phases.

BROOKLYN EAGLE COMMENTS FAVORABLY.

Moving Pictures and Children.

The discussion of the influences of the moving picture shows upon children came up once more before the Monday Club at the Children's Aid Society this week. There were speakers both for and against the pictures, but it is to be noted that the objections made were based not upon the pictures themselves, but upon the conditions amid which they are shown.

Dr. Warbasse argued that the pictures are a great educational force, and Judge Wilkin urged that they should be used as an adjunct of teaching in the public schools. Both admitted the mischief which comes from the confusion of authorities under which these exhibitions are now given, and Judge Wilkin urged that a board of public censors be appointed, with power to suppress pictures to which it objected and to supervise the management of the picture halls.

Something should be done to make this great invention the source of innocent amusement and instruction which it so easily may be. Some 5,000,000 people in this country now visit picture shows daily. They are within the reach of people too poor for the regular theaters and their influence is enormous. So far as the pictures themselves go, that influence is almost wholly for good. The conditions of their exhibition should be made as good as the pictures themselves.

It is well to keep in mind the close relationship which exists between what you read in this, your trade paper, and your prosperity; every word which appears here is written with the view of elevating and increasing the best results in the moving picture. If there is anything to criticize it is done from the loftiest motives, if anything is commended it is on account of its worthy possibilities.

True education means the "bringing out" of the best in everything, this page is set apart for the especial purpose of "bringing out" the best in every line of applied cinematography; the interested reader will not only be content in the value which he receives personally, but will pass it on and out where it can best effect and help him in his work.

Remember, then, there is a place where the Moving Picture World and your community may be benefited if brought together, as there is also a measure of material, moral and ethical value to you if you use your privileges as they so readily come to your hand.

EDUCATIONAL.

Miss E. A. Stanford, member of the Berkley, Cal., board of censors, is advocating a children's day in the theaters of that city, which means a plan to restrict the attendance of children to moving picture theaters to a certain time and place one day each week, where a strictly juvenile programme can be arranged and presented. Unlike most picture censors, this lady tries to work in harmony with moving picture people and is able to see much good in the picture.

There is difficulty in obtaining proper films for school work. The big firms that manufacture these films are dealing with customers who demand something in the nature of the dime novel and the comic supplement. It would not pay them at present to go in for the making of good films of educational value, which could easily be done, until a majority of the schools throughout the country take up the moving picture machine and themselves become regular customers, it would be next to impossible for a single school or even a half dozen to get a regular supply of educational films. Therefore, it behooves the schools, if they cannot get a steady supply, to install machines and give what they can get at intervals, and thus gradually create a healthy sale for educational subjects, which is all that is lacking at the present time.

A very attractive film now being shown by Mr. B. B. Dobs is that of a trip through Alaska. It will no doubt prove a splendid advertisement for this isolated land, as well as being an interesting subject for a lecture.

Among the many unlooked for reforms that have been brought about by the moving picture, we learn that the savage tribe in the Philippines, known as "The Head Hunters," have been so deeply impressed by moving pictures they have seen that, in their eagerness to see more pictures, they have forgoten their time-honored occupation of hunting heads.

The following educational programme was presented recently at the Auditorium, Denver, Col.: A colored film illustrating the cocoanut industry in South America, showing the natives gathering the cocoanuts and placing them on the large boats, that carry them to the markets of Europe and North America.

Another subject on the same reel showed the schools in New Guinea, and how our American missionaries are civilizing the semi-savages of that land.

Another subject was the pineapple industry in China, showing the natives growing, gathering and canning the fruit.

The other reel contained scenes from Mexico, showing President Diaz in his palace, also scenes from the border near El Paso. Another showed the amusement park in Mexico City, with a circus scene in full action.

"In the Realms of the Czar" was taken in St. Petersburg. The finish of this second reel showed the catching of lobsters off the New England coast.

TOLEDO, OHIO.—Moving pictures have so undermined the business of the Hockenberger saloon of this city that the proprietor is considering installing them himself as a means of drawing patronage. Churches and schools have felt the same way in regard to moving pictures, so that now it simmers down to a contest as to which will appropriate moving pictures for their own good. Which do you think will win, the church or the saloon? Which do you think ought win?

THE NATIONAL FILM DISTRIBUTING COMPANY.

The National Film Distributing Company has been recently organized with a view of facilitating the making of the National programme. This concern will handle exclusively the product of the various manufacturers connected with the National Film Manufacturing and Leasing Company, and will import the European product necessary to complete the project.

Mr. I. W. Ullmann and Mr. Chas. E. Kimball are now in Europe scouting the markets for the best productions and purchasing unusual novelties in forthcoming releases. Temporary offices have been opened at 34 to West Houston Street, at which place Mr. Jack Ablowich (who is associated with the two gentlemen named above in this company) is looking after the interest of the company. An advertising campaign of unusual strength will be instituted immediately and our readers are requested to watch their advertising in future issues of the Moving Picture World.

Good and Bad—Mostly Good.

F. H. Richardson.

One evening this week, the writer set forth on adventure bent, with mind to see what he might see, his trusty pen filled with vitrol, its point steeped in gall and rubbed on wormwood. Truth to tell he wore his war-bonnet and sought the trail of some luckless wight of an operator who trod not in the narrow path of good projection. The flaring sign of the Bijou Dream, Keith & Proctor's Twenty-third Street house, caught his eye and, stepping beyond the portal, faithfully regarded by the genial W. A. Adams, I sat me down to see what I might see, but soon made note that, from the rearmost seats, this was not overmuch, since staring in mine eyes were certain pestiferous unshaded, white incandescent globes, arranged under the edge of the balcony circle. These globes have since been exchanged for others of color, but they were passing painful to the eyes, and sadly interfered with enjoyment of the beauteous things seen on the screen and the marvelous wonders displayed upon the stage. (Please observe the term "marvelous." It is used advisedly, since some of the "vaudeville" stunts pulled off were truly marvelous exhibitions of nerve on part of the "actor." (?). Not all, but certainly some. Methought an outraged populace might with one accord turn thumbs down, demanding instant execution of the guilty ones but it was not so. Verily the people are a long-suffering tribe. The pictures (Licensed) were, without exception, beautiful, and fairly well rendered. Observe I use the term "rendered." Speed is the answer! The light was well handled by the operator, Mr. Raymond Phillips, and, considering the difficulties under which he works (the terrific drop from machine to screen, of which more will be said), results were distinctly creditable. At times there were slight shadows (once a very distinct one), at bottom of the picture, and friend Phillips should be just a little more careful in this respect. However, I forgive him, since excellence in other directions offsets the slight lapse. There were travelogue and illustrated song slides and they were (wonder of wonders) clean; also they were well handled, and the light all that could be desired. The illustrated song singer did his part more than well. After watching the performance, your scribe climbed toward the heavens at topmost point, almost where shingles cease and thin air begins, di covered the operating room, picture of which will appear next week or the week following. Truly it was a surprise. Its dimension is 12x9; seven and one-half feet from floor to ceiling. The walls, floor and ceiling are of asbesto millboard on light steel crossbars. Sliding doors, arranged to automatically close of their own weight, provide ideal means of ingress and egress. On the walls, neatly framed, under glass, are the rules (such as are furnished) of the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity governing operating rooms, and the illustrations and price list of parts of the machines used. The room seems ideal, except for two grievious mistakes, both of which could and should be remedied forthwith, viz in the ceiling is a 10-inch vent pipe, presumably running to the open air. But alack, also and likewise alas, while the pipe starts off bravely at 10 inches, it immediately shrinks to six! Oh my, such a business! Enlarge that pipe, gentlemen, and see to it on the order of doing it! With the excellently arranged semi-automatic shutters covering the lens and lookout holes in front wall of operating room, and there being a sixteen-inch (it might better be twenty-four) vent pipe, reels of film might burn in that room and the audience know absolutely nothing at all about it, except that the picture had disappeared. Moreover the operator would in summer be comparatively cool and comfortable, instead of roasting by slow degrees.

As to the equipment, it consists of a spotlight, dissolver and two Powers No. 6 machines. The throw is 80 ft feet and the drop from the center of screen is 21 feet. The machines set, of course, on a very high table which necessitates oil to spatter on the projection lens. The picture is in perfect focus at all points of its surface and the operators are to be congratulated on the excellent result attained under such conditions. The heavy pitch and the necessity for clearing the heads of the gilded audience of smoke the arcing of the machines on a very high, small frame arrangement. This is decidedly flimsy and awkward for the operators. I would respectfully suggest to Mr. Hector J. McKinnon, general electrician for Keith & Proctor's, whom I understand to have general supervision of these matters, that a portion or all of these steel trusses be embedded in concreteas just or all their height, I mean). They would make for stability. Sooner or later these stilted arrangements will cause trouble, unless something of the kind be done. And now for the second objection to the room as it now is. It would be much more convenient and in every way better if, even at the expense of a step in the floor, the front half be raised considerably. The machines and lookout holes are altogether too high in relation to the floor.

Please let it be understood that I consider the room and its appointments as the best I have seen in New York to date. I am merely pointing out things which might easily be, and ought to be, still further improved, to the end that the plant be perfect. The criticism is entirely friendly and will, I am sure, be thus accepted. Mr. Fred Becque is operator of the other shift at the Bijou Dream, and I can compliment his work as most excellent.

Kinemacolor in London.

Important Installation in the Beautiful Scala Theater.

An experiment which will be watched with interest on both sides of the Atlantic has just been inaugurated in London by Mr. Charles Urban, whose name is probably as well known in motion picture circles in the States as in Britain. Mr. Urban's aim is to attract fashionable London and the classes that rather despise the ordinary picture theater, to an entertainment in which motography plays the chief part. There is every reason why he should succeed, for Mr. Urban offers not the "common or garden" monochrome picture, but Kinemacolor, the wonderful process of kinematography in the hues of nature which for two years held sway at the Palace Theater, the most select music hall in London. The "upper ten," therefore, has already sampled Kinemacolor and found it good. Whilst arrangements have been in progress for its establishment in a permanent theater of its own in the British metropolis, a great number of subjects of every kind—drama, comedy, history, travel, scenic, scientific, etc. —have been prepared and additions are constantly being made.

But if the quality of the entertainment provided is exceptional, so is the building in which it is given, as the illustrations accompanying this article show. Being "fully seized," as the lawyers say, with the necessity of giving the elite the environment to which they are accustomed, Mr. Urban has leased from Dr. Distin Maddick, a distinguished devotee of the drama, the Scala Theater, a beautiful and handsomely proportioned building not far from the center of the West End theater district. Quite a romance attaches to the erection of this theater on the site of the old "Prince of Wales" made famous by the regime of the Bancrofts. For twenty years the idea of building a theater which should show the world what such structures ought to be was the ruling passion of Dr. Maddick's life. Gradually he acquired much of the surrounding property, visited all the principal theaters of the world and then set about the erection of the Scala, engaging as architect Mr. Frank Verity, a leading artist in his own particular line.

The result was undoubtedly an architectural and artistic triumph. The moment the visitor sets foot within the entrance hall of the Scala he realizes that he has come to a building quite out of the ordinary, so dignified are the proportions and so chaste the style of decoration. But his surprise is still greater when following the broad corridors he enters the auditorium. The proportions are perfect, the style of architecture is the epitome of grace, and the decorative details delight the eye. Delicately veined marble is the material chiefly used throughout the theater. The boxes are the principal feature of the auditorium; the illustrations, however, show them so clearly that it is unnecessary to describe them in detail. Behind the royal box is a magnificent suite or apartments. The theater takes its name from the staircase—really an additional balcony—which with a gentle decline breaks away on either side into a magnificent flight of ivory veined marble steps leading to the orchestra stalls. From the steps access may be obtained on either side to the ladies' and gentlemen's foyer, both of which have the advantage of being clearly visible from the auditorium and form, moreover, additional direct means of exit to the street. Not the least unique feature of the house is the orchestra. This in most theaters is a mere affix; here it has been architecturally designed in unison with the rest of the house and is sunk after the fashion of the Wagner Theater, Berlin.

There are also an exceptionally large pit, with reception hall behind; a balcony, with a separate saloon of its own; and a gallery, far superior to those at most London theaters. Stage, dressing rooms and managerial offices are all contrived with a view to the utmost utility.

For the purposes of Kinemacolor projection a large operating chamber has been constructed at the back of the staircase, and its size may be judged from the fact that fifty seats have been removed to make room for it. The chamber will contain three Kinemacolor machines, two to be used for color projection and one, with the color filter removed, for black and white pictures. The current is supplied from a rotary transformer, working from 440 volts, delivering at 70 volts from a specially constructed dynamo. The throw is approximately 75 feet.

Kinemacolor, as has been indicated, is not the only film of the Scala program. For the first half hour the applicability of Kinemacolor to every-day scenes is demonstrated. For the second there are humorous and dramatic scenes; for the third Urban science lectures, explained and illustrated by Kinemacolor; then topical events—a newspaper in motion. The last hour is devoted to short plays—just now Mr. Paul Lincke is giving his successful operetta "Castles in the Air" (Frau Luna). Prices will be maintained at the standard prevailing at West End theaters. With a program on these distinctive lines, combining the best of the entertainment given at existing theaters, music halls and picture halls and presented under the best possible conditions, there seems every reason to believe that Mr. Urban will succeed in widening the area of appeal of the kinematograph and so lead the way to further advancement in the future.

Their Serene Highnesses Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck have graciously promised to give their support and presence on Tuesday evening.

Los Angeles.

By Richard V. Spencer.

Edna Loftus (in private life Mrs. Harry Rheinstrom) recently resumed the stage as a means of livelihood when she announced her engagement to play leads for the Western Essanay Company under the management of Mr. G. M. Anderson. The Essanay Company is now working near Redlands, where it has for some time established a temporary studio. This is the latest legitimate star to transfer her talents to the moving picture industry.

Mr. Bosworth and some ten members of the Selig Stock Company have gone to San Pedro, where they will spend a few days taking a series of marine scenes in the vicinity.

Mr. K. W. Linn, special representative of Pathe Freres, who has been in the city the past few days looking after the Pathe local interests, has left the city for New York by the Southern route, and will stop over at Chicago en route.

Harry Reimers, camera man, has returned from Mexico, where he had gone to photograph the Revolution. The Selig Company reports that he was successful in his quest. Mr. Reimers has gone to Chicago.

The California Motion Picture Manufacturing Company, heretofore identified with the producing end of the business, is about to take up the exhibiting end. It is the intention of the corporation to build a circuit of Independent theaters in the Southwest, with Los Angeles as the hub of the wheel. Its first enterprise was to lease for a term of years the only available site on the Long Beach board walk, or rather cement walk known as the Strand. Frank Crowe was the lessor. The lot has 100 feet frontage and a depth of 60 feet to an alley. The five-year lease was purchased for $18,000. The corporation will improve the property immediately with a handsome theater, which, when completed, will be devoted to Independent releases. This is the ninth picture theater to be established in Long Beach, a city of 20,000. The corporation also has options on Los Angeles sites, and an option on San Pedro theater sites. Later the corporation intends to invade San Diego and erect a theater there. Its Long Beach house will be hurried to completion in order to receive the benefit of summer business.

For a stated consideration of $8,000, Miles & Tegner recently purchased from J. D. Newman a fifty-foot lot on the south side of Oregon avenue, between Second and Third streets. They have announced their purpose to erect immediately a two-story business block at a cost of $10,000. The building will accommodate a moving picture theater seating 480, also two small stores, with offices above. Work on the structure will be begun at once and the lessees expect to see it completed in ninety days.

Charles Noland, junior member of the firm of Hewitt & Noland, proprietors of the Lyric Film Picture Theater, of Riverside, Cal., on the evening of April 13th, attempted to commit suicide by shooting himself in the left breast with a .25 caliber automatic pistol. Noland is 24 years of age. No cause is given for his rash act. As the ball is being written he is lying at the point of death at the City Hospital, Riverside.

Arthur S. Hyman, president of the Hyman Theater circuit, has left for San Francisco on a business trip. He is accompanied by Mrs. Hyman, and maid, and son Carrolton. He will book novelty vaudeville acts in the North over his local circuit.

The Union (Independent) on Main Street, between Second and Third Streets, which has been closed recently on account of attachment proceedings, is again open for business. Independent service has been resumed.

M. L. Dull, formerly proprietor of the Bijou, has sold his lease to J. A. Quinn and G. M. McLean. Messrs. Quinn and McLean are also the proprietors of the Ideal Theater and formerly ran a string of motion picture theaters in Arizona. The firm has other important deals pending, and will take over several other theaters or build new ones.

Butler's is the newest Independent house to make its bow to the public. The new theater is located at 608 South Hill Street, and is one of the coziest and best arranged five-cent theaters in the city. The house seats 250. The theater will show three reels of first run Independent films and one song specialty. The theater will open on April 22d and will be under the management of M. L. Butler. A two-piece orchestra consisting of drums and piano will be used.

Boston.

Columbia Theater for Marcus Loew?

Mr. Harry N. Farren, of the Columbia Music Hall, Boston, together with his associate, Mr William Edwards, presented himself before Judge Morton, of the Supreme Court, asking that the owners of the Music Hall be prevented from selling the property, unless the lease held by them be recognized. Messrs. Edwards and Farren claim that their present lease on the Music Hall does not expire until 1914, and that they wish to continue operating the theater with burlesque attractions.

It is stated by the Marcus Loew interests that they expect to acquire the property very shortly, and that it is their desire to occupy the house as soon as possible with their usual attractions of "pop" vaudeville and pictures. The Columbia Music Hall property was sold at auction on April 6, because of foreclosure proceedings. It was "bid in" by H. B. Humphrey, lawyer. Messrs. Farren and Edwards claim that this was merely a trick in order to avoid recognizing their lease, and that therefore they wish to prohibit the sale going through, unless their lease is recognized. The representatives of Marcus Loew hold that this foreclosure breaks the lease, and that, according to ordinary real estate laws, the tenants of the property are merely "tenants at will." Judge Morgan reserved his decision for more explicit evidence, data, etc. Should the Marcus Loew interests acquire control of the Music Hall, they will have two houses in Boston. The Orpheum, downtown, has been under the Loew regime since early last fall. The Music Hall is at the far end of the city, going uptown, and the two houses would have but little effect on each other's trade. The Music Hall is a large house, with two balconies and numerous boxes in addition to a large auditorium. The house was built some years back, and was originally intended for a "$2" house, but its location could not draw the desired trade, and it was soon turned into a burlesque theater. The decorations, exits, lobby and general architecture is of the best quality. It was also rumored that the Automatic Vaudeville Company, of New York, which operates many moving picture theaters in large cities, have a hand in this deal.

As a result of the investigation made at Boston moving picture theaters, the text of which was printed in these columns last week, Building Commissioner Harrell sent out a notice to all managers of theaters and moving picture houses, which stated that all portable advertising signs and pictures in front of theater entrances and exits would be removed. The only pictures to be allowed hereafter, in the lobbies of Boston theaters are to be those that are fixed flat against the walls in such a manner that they shall not interfere with a free passage of the audiences. As a result the theaters have been laboring strenuously to find places for the lobby advertising matter which shall comply with this edict. Thus is the only result of the lengthy report used by the committee on moving picture conditions. Its suggestions that the vaudeville in moving picture theaters be taken up by the authorities and that the costs be looked into, have not been acted upon. It is not expected that any further action of the report will be made. Consequently the report "shot its bolt" without raising any dust, and is going the way of all other such masterpieces of errors and misinformation, the way to oblivion and the waste basket.

At a meeting of the Boston Moving Picture Operators Union, No. 182, held on Sunday, April 6, four new members were admitted to the union and paid their initiation fee of fifty dollars each. At the meeting a committee was appointed to arrange for a concert to be held in Boston within the next time weeks. The committee in charge of the arrangements is made up of William C. Hildreth, Edward Sands, Charles Ward, Walter Foster, Harry Rosenbert and James Burke. Mr. L. E. Nutter, a member of the local, and at present employed by an automobile concern, that is sending him throughout the country, working in his line for the business of the concern, reported that the means of moving picture operators throughout the Middle West and South are in a flourishing condition. Mr. Nutter is now in Dallas, Tex. The local Boston union has several of its members employed throughout the country in this line of work. Henceforth the local union will meet at 724 Washington Street, on the first Wednesday night and the third Sunday afternoon of the month. The Wednesday night meetings are scheduled to commence at eleven o'clock. The Boston union is one of the best in the country and is well organized in every way.

New uniforms for the ushers of the Star Theater, Tremont Row, are a distinct improvement in the looks of the boys.

April 19th is a holiday in Massachusetts, and the local moving picture houses rolled up some big totals for that date. In the afternoon and evening the houses could not cope with the business.

HENRY.

Louisville.

Since Easter Sunday local establishments have been playing to capacity houses at practically every show, and the general situation is highly satisfactory. Within the next fortnight or so every show house in the city will have been freshened up with new paint and enamel and picture possessions will present a generally spick-and-span appearance. Ventilating experts are now being employed to inspect ventilating apparatus in the various theaters to insure perfect operation during the sweltering period, and considerable new machinery, fans, etc., are being installed.

On May 7 a summer run of motion pictures, supplemented by six vaudeville acts, will be started by the Princess Amusement Company at the Gayety Theater, on Jefferson Street between Third and Fourth Avenues, which is now playing burlesque. Three reels of picture plays will be shown and Manager Irvin Simon will be in charge, as he is general manager for the other Princess houses in Louisville. The admission rate will probably be 15 cents.

"We broke just about even at our theaters during Lent, but since Easter business has certainly been on the boom," said Manager Irvin Simon, of the Princess Amusement Company in the Hopkins Theater Building. "The Orpheum, Casino and Superba have been experiencing a fine run and Hopkin's Theater is getting its usual good business, with no prospect of diminution for the rest of the summer."

The Princess Amusement Company is preparing all its houses for summer trade. The Orpheum, on Jefferson Street between Third and Fourth Avenues, is being repainted throughout, and a drummer has been added to the musical staff of the Superba, on Fourth Avenue near Market Street.

Irvin Simon, of the Princess Amusement Company, returned last week from a short trip to Chicago, where he went in connection with the motion picture interests of his company.

"Both theaters of the Royal Amusement Company, the Royal at Eighteenth Street and Broadway and the Majestic on Fourth Avenue, have been running to capacity limit during the past fortnight," said President L. J. Dittman, of the Royal company, to a representative of the Moving Picture World. "The Majestic has been having particular success handling shopping crowds since settled weather has arrived."

President Dittmar, of the Royal Amusement Company, is now ensconced in a handsome suite of offices just above the box office at the Majestic Theater on Fourth Avenue near Chestnut Street. The offices were recently completed and the Royal chief executive is wearing a smile of satisfaction.

John Ward, formerly manager of the Walnut Street Theater, while it operated motion pictures and vaudeville and also during a stock company run, has contracted to manage the Avenue Theater during the coming summer, opening on May 1. The Avenue program will be continuous vaudeville, composed mainly of motion pictures, as but six vaudeville acts have been provided. The Avenue will operate on a 10-cent admission basis and promises to be as popular as ever during the summer months.

House Manager J. P. Hupill, of the Broadway Theater at Shelby Street and Broadway, expressed himself as being delighted with post-Lenten business at his theater. Manager Fred Dolle, of the West Broadway Theater at Eighteenth Street and Broadway, which is owned by the same company that operates the Broadway, said that business conditions could not very well be improved.

The Broadway Amusement Company, which now operates the Broadway and West Broadway houses in Louisville, is developing a couple of airdomes, covering both the eastern and western portions of the city. The airdome in the West End is located at Twenty-Third and Market Streets and will be completed by May 15. It has a seating capacity for 1,500 people and will be one of the largest enclosures of its kind in Louisville. The amusement company is operating each of its houses under a separately organized company. The company to operate the West Market Street Airdome was recently incorporated with a capital stock of $800 under the name of the Ideal Amusement Company, the following officers being named: Fred J. Dolle, president; L. P. Steuris, vice-president; H. H. Gocke, secretary-treasurer.

The Savoy Theater was opened last Sunday at Baxter and Highland Avenues in the Highland residence district. The new house is running an unusually good vaudeville and motion picture bill.

The Broadway Amusement Company is planning the formation of a company to operate an airdome on Baxter Avenue in the Highlands. The airdome, which is now being planned, will be completed by May 15 and will seat 800 persons. The company to operate the new theater has not yet been incorporated.

On July 15 work will be begun upon a motion picture theater of the most modern type at 410 South Fourth Avenue, the building now occupied by the Benedict Company, caterers. M. Switow, who operates the Crystal Theater on Market Street near Third Avenue in Louisville, as well as a couple of houses in Jeffersonville and New Albany, Ind., has secured a lease on the property, which is one of the most valuable locations in the retail business district and is said to have been leased at $18,000 per year. Mr. Switow proposes to expend several thousand dollars in making the new theater one of the handsomest and best equipped in the South. Its seating capacity will be about 800 persons.

The next week or so will see the openings for the summer of both Fontaine Ferry and Riverview parks, in the extreme western portion of Louisville on the Ohio River bank. The vaudeville theaters at each of these pleasure resorts will run a motion picture program in connection with vaudeville bills.

New England.

Mr. J. H. Tebbetts, of Pittsfield, Mass., is completing plans for the erection of a picture and vaudeville theater in that city. The house will be situated on North Street, and will hold approximately 1,500 people. Mr. Tebbetts is a well known theatrical man, and expects his new house to be the best of its kind in Pittsfield.

Mr. James C. Thornton, of River Point, R. I., has had work started on his new opera house. The house will front on Allen Street, and will be 60 feet in width and 160 feet in length. The opera house will seat 1,400 people when completed. Mr. Thornton hopes to be ready for the public on the middle of next September.

Mr. R. J. McDonald has returned to the Sheedy Theater, Holyoke, Mass., as manager, after an absence of two months. Mr. McDonald will also take care of the new Gilmore Theater, Springfield, Mass., dividing his attention between the two theaters. Mr. L. G. Grossman, who managed the Sheedy house during Manager McDonald's absence, is no longer at that house.

The Empire Theater, of Lowell, Mass., found the competition of the larger moving picture houses entirely too strong, and has closed permanently.

Mr. Frederick Rea, who is talking the pictures for the Comique Theater, Lynn, Mass., is meeting with success, and the innovation will continue for some time. The vaudeville was cut off the Comique's bills to make room for the lecture.

The Rhode Island Theatrical Managers' Protective Association again came into the lime light when Mr. Charles Lovenberg, manager of B. F. Keith's Providence theater, and president of the association, appeared before the Legislature of Rhode Island, regarding a bill which proposed to bar all standees from Rhode Island theaters. Mr. Lovenberg stated that the Protective Organization had already, of its own volition, taken steps to prevent overcrowding of theaters belonging to the association. Mr. Lovenberg asserted that a limited number of standees was absolutely without danger to the audiences; that it was only the overdoing that should be stopped. Should the bill pass the Legislature as it is at present framed—which forbids any standing at all—many Rhode Island theaters would be forced to close; and many of those able to remain open would be forced to materially lower the quality of their attractions, was the statement of the association's to the committee in charge. Mr. Lovenberg outlined the plans of the association, and told of what it had already accomplished, although very recently formed. The committee on judiciary affairs is now considering the bill. Opinion points out that the bill will not be passed, at least in its present form. This appearance of Manager Lovenberg before the committee was the first public effort made by the Protective Association.

The Legislature of Connecticut is at present wrestling with the problem as to how old an operator should be before a Connecticut license is granted him. The present age limit is twenty-one, and the chances are that this limit will be reduced a couple of years.

HENRY.

Star Theater, Duluth, Minn.

We reproduce herewith two photographs of the splendid Star Theate, located at 2107 West Superior Street, Duluth, Minn, as an example of tasty decoration and general excellence. We have heard so much unfavorable talk about "store shows" and "bungaloos" that it is time to refute such pessimistic references by calling attention to this splendid little show house.

Notice, first of all, if you will, the cleanliness of it all, and then allow your eyes to dwell upon the inviting interior. Surely, if this theater has not the right to call itself "the house beautiful" no theater that ever was built can have the right. On the side walls you will see panels containing landscapes restful to the eye. These are set in the lavish stucco work with a degree of nicety that we have never seen surpassed. The floor slopes downward, and gives a clear view of the curtain. At the far end we see the dainty little proscenium arch with its nicely painted curtain. This pretty house is also dignified and restful to the regard that the proprietor has for the proper housing of the moving picture.

There is not much more that we can say on the subject; the pictures speak for themselves, both the interior and the exterior views. Suffice it to say that we have never received photographs of a daintier theater from any part of the world. It puts a quietus on the croaking of the pessimist that a "store show" is necessarily an undesirable affair.

The Fall of Troy.

The Itala Company Produces Homer's Glorious Story.

Helen of Troy, as she is called, was the wife of the Greek king, Menelaus. Her father was Jove, the King of Gods, and her mother was a mortal woman. She was the most beautiful woman the world had ever seen. She was so beautiful that all the Greeks looked upon her as a national treasure. So, when Paris, the son of Priamus, King of Troy, abducted her from her husband's home, all the Greeks joined Menelaus in an expedition, with a thousand ships, to attack Troy, the home of the abductor. For ten years the Greeks stormed the walls of this great city without sucess. In the end, by means of a stratagem, a big wooden horse in which a dozen of the bravest Greeks were hidden, they managed to set the city on fire and so destroyed it.

It was, indeed, an adventurous undertaking, this attempt to reproduce the scenes of this great story told by Homer, a poet of Greece, who was Shakespeare's equal. Yet, no expense was spared in making these pictures, and as one beautiful scene after another is thrown on the screen, we see, not set-scenes, built up in a theater, but what appear to be the very palaces of Greece, with columned halls and marble stairs.

Menelaus, the king, takes leave of his wife in the beautiful garden back of his palace and, mounting his two-wheeled chariot, drives away to pay a visit. We see him, in the next scene, driving through the beech-tree bordered lanes of Sparta. Then comes Paris, as an ambassador and Helen, the mistress of the house in the absence of her husband, receives him in the great marble hall. It is lined with fluted Doric columns and thronged with attendants, her own house servants and those who have followed Paris bearing rich gifts.

Paris is smitten by a shaft of love at first sight of beautiful Helen. In the garden she repulses him; but later, as the two stand together, on the lawn beside the palace, a lonely place bathed in silver moonlight, Venus, the Goddess of Love, appears. Venus favors Paris. Was it possible for a mortal woman, though she were wholly lovely, to hold out against the power of a goddess? Helen falls into Paris' arms and Venus throws her veil over them. She disappears. We catch a glimpse of them as they are wafted away to Troy in Venus' magic sea-shell chariot, accompanied by all the flying Loves.

Menelaus won't believe the news at first. We see him thunderstruck by it, as he sits feasting in another beautiful room. Home again, we see him gathering together the heroes of Greece who swear to revenge him.

By this time Paris has reached Troy with his beautiful paramour and we have a picture of a luxurious feast in a gorgeous palace of the Phrygian city. Paris brings Helen a golden cup of wine and they drink from it by turns. Then the Greek ships appear outside the big harbor, far glimpses of which can be seen from the palace. Helen looks out and sees her former friends and seems much disturbed.

Now follow some of the most remarkable scenes ever produced. One is an attack on the walls of a great city by an innumerable army. A movable tower is wheeled slowly up against the battlements and scaling ladders are brought, but great stones are hurled against the tower and down on the thick crowds of the besiegers. The Greeks lose too many men and have to retreat. Now they resort to strategy.

The next picture is magnificent. We see the great wooden horse on a hillside and Troy in the distance. The Greeks retreat and the rejoicing Trojans break a passage in the wall of their city and draw in the horse. They suppose it an offering to the gods. A Grecian spy takes the news to the hiding fleet. Night comes. The hiding heroes come from the horse and set the city in flames. The rest of the Greek army appears. Now, as the flames spread through the city, we catch glimpses of turmoil and confusion. Parties of inhabitants fleeing in terror, caught by Greeks and turning at bay only to be cut down.

Paris and Helen are asleep. They awake and throw open the casement. Troy, the glorious, is now a sea of flames. They rush into the palace. In its great columned hall they meet Menelaus and the Greeks. Menelaus kills Paris, and has Helen led away. Now, looking back, we see a sad vision of a ruined city and its smouldering red-hot walls.

A Festive Sunday in Yonkers.

F. H. Richardson.

Last Sunday the writer journeyed to Yonkers, on pleasure and adventure bent. Starting north via surface car he transferred to the subway (elevated out there) at 215th Street, merely to see where the thing went to anyhow.

Arriving at 242d Street, which proved the finish of the subway, he spied a surface car with the legend "Yonkers Railway" emblazoned on its side. Me for Yonkers, cried your scribe, and piled in. Arriving at the historic little city he quickly decided it would be a most excellent opportunity to visit her motion picture theaters, but alack, and likewise alas! all were closed as tight as the proverbial drum. Nothing doing in the show line in Yonkers on Sunday.

This, to the writer's mind, is pure foolishness—I might almost say idiocy. In Yonkers I saw hundreds upon hundreds of men and boys, as well as quite a few women and girls, standing around or wandering aimlessly about with apparently nothing to do. I asked one young man the question: "What do you do here on Sunday, with no theaters and nothing in the way of amusement?" "Stand around and hate ourselves," was his brief reply. And it was quite expressive, too. Those who enact blue laws for Sunday "observance" are, to the writer's way of thinking, merely acting silly. They may shut off the amusements on that day, thus depriving those who toil six days in the week of the only opportunity they have for recreation, but they cannot force them to stay home and read good books, or even attend church. In very many cases such laws do distinct harm, such as forcing young men to secretly seek amusement they may not indulge in openly. These amusements are more than likely to be harmful, if not downright demoralizing. Many a sly poker game is in progress on Sunday in the "closed" town, which never would have been thought of had theatrical and other clean amusement been available. The average man works like a slave six days in the week. He resents, and rightly resents, any interference with his right to wholesome amusements, such as theaters or baseball, on the one day left him for recreation and enjoyment. In a city situated as is Yonkers the effect is, as it is some cases, to drive the men, and a percentage of the women as well, to seek recreation in the city. Maybe the amusements they find are clean and all that could be desired, and maybe they are not. A further result of the closed town is to embitter many against the influence which has deprived them of their chance of enjoying their leisure. Usually this takes the form of resentment against the church and matters religious, which is wrong. Neither the church or religion should be blamed for the actions of fanatics and zealots. The people who close amusements on Sunday would have been in the forefront of the zealots who burned "heretics" at the stake, pulled them apart with horses, gouged out their eyes, encased the foot of their victims in an iron boot and filled it with moulten metal, had they lived a few hundreds of years ago. That they mean well it would be uncharitable to doubt, but, be it mentioned, there is a certain place said to be paved with good intentions!

In this connection let me add just a word as to the exclusion of children under 16 from moving picture theaters. I do not assert that such a law is altogether wrong, but let me ask if the moving picture show is worse than the gutter—than the street? These children are not barred from the streets, which thousands of them roam, unhindered by parental or other restraint, until ten, eleven and twelve o'clock—in many cases even later. Truly the street is a great educator in crime. Methinks the moving picture show could not possibly be a greater. We allow our young men, little more than boys, to frequent "burlesque" shows where questionable, or even licentious acts by females on the stage are the chief drawing card. We freely allow children of any age to visit the "melodrama" where murder, robbery and about every sort of crime is depicted in its every detail. We allow grown-ups, often accompanied by children, to visit plays where females under the guise of art, dance suggestive dances stripped almost to nudity. We allow females in "vaudeville" to ride out over the audience composed of men, boys, women and girls, in a dark house (as was pointed out in these columns last week) and dangle their legs (that's' the word) down among the heads of the audience, one of the main features of this "act" being the squeals of the "actress," suggestive of stolen garters—not exactly suggestive either since the garters are proudly displayed afterwards by men in the audience. In this connection let us remember that garters are not worn on the ankle. But when we come to the picture show we turn a moral somersault and suddenly become tremendously careful of the children's morals! It is to laugh!

Please do not misunderstand me. I yield to no man in desire to protect the children in every right way. I am thoroughly in favor of an absolutely strict and effective censorship of films. I believe in a house being lighted sufficiently, so that no overt act can be committed under cover of darkness. I do not, however, believe in straining at a gnat and gulping an elephant down whole. The above contains some plain talk, I know; the subject seems to justify plain talk, however, and the writer has no apology to make.

The Moving Picture and the Public Press

When we consider that the moving picture reaches today a far greater portion of the amusement-loving public than the stage and is constantly growing in importance as an educational factor, taking rank with the library and the public school, it is difficult to understand the attitude of the public press toward this most important invention. With many honorable exceptions the daily press in the great cities of the land is wofully ignorant of the doings in the moving picture world. It was but yesterday that the "moving picture show" figured principally in the criminal news columns, telling how some half-grown boys, incited thereto by frequent visits to the moving picture theater, had gone to hunt Indians, had robbed their employer's till or committed some other more or less spectacular crime. Any self-constituted, trousered or skirted reformer on rampage, turning his wrath against the "debasing influence of the cheap moving picture show" was reasonably sure of half a column, and of more, if the day was dull and news was scattered. Recently, when the great progress of the moving picture and its striking improvement forced the press to take notice, the tribute was paid grudgingly and to a lesser extent than formerly. The moving picture is still the target of the police reporter and the lawful prey of the brilliant writer of paragraphs all the year round.

The Biograph Company some time ago rendered Browning's "Pippa Passes" into moving pictures. Around the poetry and doctrine of Browing there has grown a cult, one might almost say a worship. It is the cult and worship —alas—of but a few. The mines of gold in Browning's works will, to the great masses of the people, remain undiscovered. The style and what may be called the mannerisms of that truly great man will make a wide and genuine popularity of his writings impossible; the more's the pity. If means can be found to clothe his noble thoughts, his great hopes for mankind in simpler words, or better still in pictures—what a gain for the world, what a blessing for the toiling masses. It would seem that such a performance was worth space as a news item and entitled to some comment among the pearls of the editorial page. All I have seen were some insipid witticisms of newspaper paragraphers who prophesied the rendition of Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason" as the most probable embodiment of literature in moving pictures. Once and there one comes across a line or two to the effect that a great actress has posed for moving pictures and received a fabulous amount of money for doing so.

Truly for its progress, its splendid development, its marvelous rise and a moral influence in our civilization the moving picture owes no thanks to the daily press. The forces that have lifted the business to a higher level and made the exhibiting of moving pictures as useful and important as the preacher or the newspaper writer, have all come from within the industry itself, and whatever there is today of wise and beneficent control, has on the whole its origin in the ranks of the makers of the moving picture.

The exhibitors are in a position to force from the daily press in city and country a fuller and juster appreciation of the moving picture and its place in the field of amusements or education. Every maker of films sends out vast quantities of literature free to every exhibitor. Much of this literature may be made useful to the exhibitor by a little condensing; too much of it goes to waste. It is well for the exhibitor to read the stories of the films he has to use, but it is even better to let the public know something about them before they see them. It is an easy matter to get the materials for a good, attractive sign out of the manufacturers' folders, or from the columns of the Moving picture World. It is likewise easy to compose a clever and effective advertisement from these circulars for the press. If the exhibitor insists on his rights as an advertiser to at least one weekly reading notice he will generally get it, especially if he has the "copy" ready for the editor. This will add both to the knowledge and dignity of the moving picture and make effective its claim to equal treatment with the stage.

Big Meeting of Ohio Exhibitors.

The Exhibitors' League, of the State of Ohio, will hold a meeting in Columbus, Ohio, May 2, 1911, at the Southern Hotel. The meeting will begin at 10 a. m. Every member of the league is expected to be present also a large attendance from other States; this will be the largest gathering of exhibitors ever held in the United States. The Exhibitors' League of Ohio has grown very rapidly, and is now represented by the leading exhibitors of the State, as well as many members from adjoining States.

The large membership of the Ohio League to some extent is caused by reason of unjust laws that have been presented which would work hardships upon them, hence the getting together of the exhibitors for self-protection. The League has so far succeeded in defeating all adverse legislation. Its members have individually and collectively taken care of the interests of the League. It would be well for other States to get busy and organize, as it is only a matter of time until they will meet with the same conditions that Ohio has had to meet, and if they are not prepared they will find it is exceedingly expensive to be without an organization.

Every State in the Union should be represented at the Ohio State meeting, as the information delegates will gain will be of great value to their State organization. The Ohio State organization stands ready to assist, as far as possible, other States in organizing, realizing the great good that has been accomplished in our State.

The following are a few of the things that will be done at the State meeting at Columbus, Ohio, May 2, 1911: Delegates will be elected to attend the National convention. A National call will be issued, and legislative committees will be elected; also fire insurance committee. A State emblem will be adopted; reports of the various committees and officers. This is to be a thorough business organization. A committee on an outing which the exhibitors will give later on, probably at Cedar Point, Ohio, will be elected. An official paper will probably be designated.

The League of Ohio to-day stands upon its merits as an organization founded upon honorable and just principles, demanding and accepting nothing only that which is right. We hope to have visiting brothers from Canada as well as Ohio. Let the motto of all exhibitors be "Get together." M. A. NEFF.

THE REALISTIC MOVING PICTURE.
View of ties burning.

The enterprise of the present-day film producer is well illustrated in this scene from "The Railroad Builder," a Thanhouser fire for which hundreds of old railroad ties furnished the smoke.

Arrives in Africa.

Mr. J. C. Hemment, who accompanied Paul J. Rainey, millionaire sportsman, in search of big game, has arrived in Port Said, enroute to African jungles, as is shown by letter received from him by our Mr. Richardson. Mr. Hemment accompanies the expedition as official photographer. He has taken with him, in addition to suitable cameras for stationary photography, one of the best motion picture cameras money could buy. He expects to procure some of the best genuine big game motion pictures ever secured. Jack Hemment is the one to make good on that kind of expectation, too, if anyone can. Motion picturedom will await his return with much interest. Incidentally Mr. Hemment mailed, at Port Said, a letter addressed, "Big Bill Edwards, United States of America." The letter bore no other address and Mr. Hemment made a wager of ten dollars it would be delivered. "Big Bill" is head of the New York City street cleaning department. The letter was mailed at Port Said March 10, 1911. It was delivered to "Big Bill" in his office, New York City, March 28, 1911.

THE POSTER.

Exhibitors from New York City and Cincinnati write us complaining that the manufacturers, in striving for art effects in their posters, lessen their real value. As one puts it, the passer-by will look at a poster bearing the photograph of an actor or of a scene from the film and not be induced to enter; whereas, if the title of a new film which he had not yet seen was the most prominent feature, the effect upon the mind was generally beneficial to the box office. Complaint is specific as to the sameness in appearance of one company's posters and others in which the title of the film is made the least prominent. What is the use of the manufacturer going to great expense for elaborate picture posters in color if a plain and striking display of the title of a new film has more drawing power? After all, the manager takes more delight in seeing his seats filled than making a picture gallery of his lobby.

NEWS BRIEFS.

Anaconda, Mont. Anaconda is soon to have a new industry added to its substantial pay roll. The Industrial Motion Picture Company, of Montana, has decided on establishing its headquarters in this city. Amongst the directors of the new company are two well known Anaconda business men.

Temple, Tex.—Mr. Frank Lucas, manager and owner of the Majestic Theater here, sold his interest to Mr. Sid Stone, of Waco, Tex. Mr. Stone is an experienced motion picture man, and he expects to keep up the policy of Mr. Lucas, which was to give his patrons the very best pictures obtainable. At present Mr. Lucas will be at leisure, but keeping his eyes open to pick up the first opportunity that presents itself. Under agreement, he will not again enter the theater business in this city.

Kansas City. We admire the action of the Kansas City exhibitors in donating some of their proceeds to the Girls' Hotel benefit. Each manager has agreed to display a sign which will read: "We are with you ladies. We want the Girls' Hotel, because we know better than anyone else in this town, how much a girls' hotel is needed. We like to know that girls who leave our shows are going to a decent place." Such spirit as this, if observed everywhere, would be of benefit to the business.

A bill has been introduced in the Assembly at Albany, New York, which requires operators in cities of the first class to take out a license after passing a practical examination.

CLASSY SLIDES.

This week's song slide release of Alfred L. Simpson, Inc., illustrated from J. Fred Helf's great novelty hit entitled, Give Me a Show, I'm Falling in Love, appeals to us as being one of the best feature sets of slides it has been our pleasure to inspect for some time. The posing of the models and the locations selected, combined with perfect photography and laboratory work assure for this release a preference over the average run of slides.

THE BIG HAT BRIGADE.

The Pastime Theater, Boston, Mass., has reserved the last five rows for ladies who do not wish to remove their millinery, and the rule is rigidly enforced. Placards and slides make it plain. If men sit there they must take the consequences. It is needless to add that the men avoid it as they would the smallpox.

CONSTRUCTION DECORATIONS

WALL PAPER SCENERY.

By H. F. Hoffman.

Some managers of picture houses that have stages and scenery like to have a new dress once in a while. Many of them are rather ashamed to have their audience sit and look at the same old setting year after year. They are right about that, for one of the wisest rules in theatrical business is to keep constantly changing. The manager who is constantly springing little surprises on his patrons is the manager whose place always possesses an unconscious or indescribable charm. Something fresh once in a while is necessary to prevent stagnation. A change of pictures on the walls, replacing the old statue with a new one, a new shade for the box-office light, any little thing like the changing of a light from one place to another, a complete change of announcement slides, or any other minor and inexpensive change, all help to keep the old show-shop from going stale, and should be attended to regularly.

It is rather more expensive to be changing scenery once a month than it would be to change an announcement slide; that is, if you pay a scenic artist his price each time you make the change. It is a fact, nevertheless, that the stage setting in the one-scene house is looked at more than any other one thing, and for that very reason it should be changed as often as possible. This applies to new theaters now building as well as to those of long standing. In fact, the suggestion contained in this article comes better for the house now building, for the reason that any who like the idea may have their frames adapted to it from the start, thus saving time and money.

Wall paper scenery is about the only kind of scenery that it pays to change once a month. The writer has used it and found it to be practical in every way. The idea came as an inspiration when a lad, being then manager of a "boy" theater. It worked successfully then and it worked out finely in later years when the boy showman was a man and had a theater of his own. Wall paper scenery is certainly the thing for small houses or for theaters in small towns where there are no scenic artists. It is more for the benefit of this kind of houses that this article is prepared, instead of for the large fully equipped theater that employs several different settings, but, even so, the idea of wall paper scenery is feasible for large theaters as well as small ones. Theater managers who have an old parlor scene are advised to cover it up with tasty wall paper and solid wood-work. If it looks bad there must be something the matter with the taste of the man who puts it on.

Good taste is more the secret of successful wall paper scenery than the idea of wall paper itself. It is quite possible to hang wall paper in a way that would be funny, as amateur paper hangers generally do, but worst of all is the choosing of colors that glare at each other. If you do not pick harmonious colors, the effect will be very jarring, but there is one consolation, if you don't like it you can cover it up and try again. While I was building the scene represented in the drawings I have made for this article, my competitor up the street walked into my theater and seeing me at work, immediately wanted to know what I was doing. We were very good friends, almost pals, and I explained without hesitation all the beauties of wall paper scenery. He told me it was a great idea, and said he must be going because he had to tune his piano.

I met him that night after the show, as I often did. He wanted me to come right over to his place and take a look at his new scenery. The house was dark and we were alone. He put on the lights and bid me behold. He waved his hand with pride to a wall paper scene that had been begun and finished since I had seen him in the morning. I roared with mirth at the effort he had made. Being done in such a short time it was of course very rough. The closer one got the rougher it was, but the worst of it was that in his hurry to beat me to it he had taken the first wall paper he could get his hands on, and the result was a fright. I guyed him for an hour after that, and he didn't seem to like it. The next night he invited me in to see his new scenery. During the day he had changed his wall paper from green and yellow to red and blue. It was bad, but not so bad as at first. I ridiculed him once more, and once more he changed things, each time doing a little better, until at last he had rather a pleasing stage setting.

The object of the above paragraph is merely to show that changes can be quickly made, but, where judgment and good taste are not used, it gets on the nerves of the audience quicker than the soothing effect of harmonious colors. The scene represented in the drawings herewith was not built in a day. Allowing full days, it would take a week for one man to do it, and more than likely, two weeks. The main difficulty is that the frames must be built inside the theater, unless you have doors large enough to take them through, which is doubtful. If the work is done in the auditorium, the frames must be made across the seats, and that is very unhandy. This is bound to make some muss which must be cleaned up before the night show. If there are matinees, so much the less time there is to work in. Each day the tools and lumber must be brought in, and before the show everything must be carried out again to make way for the audience. The frames being too large to be taken out must be placed on the stage in the places they are to occupy later, and then draped with some temporary curtains or cloth.

It would not be at all advisable for one man alone to attempt to build the scene which I have drawn here. Two men could do the work in one fourth the time it would take one man, for the reason that there are long measurements to be taken, and also for the well known reason that scenery always seems to get "wabbly" and limber when one man tries to juggle it. Perhaps you've noticed that before. As to the frames, to save time and worry, the best thing a manager could do would be to hand these drawings of mine to a good carpenter and his assistant. To them it would be only a day's work. They have all the tools. They don't make mistakes, and they work fast. While you are scratching your head they would be cutting a dozen lengths. In other words you are a manager and not a carpenter. Never try to beat a tradesman at his own game, especially if you are in a hurry.

The attention of the class is now called to the framework shown in fig. 1. You will notice that the drawing has been divided in the middle, for the sake of convenience. There is no use showing the same thing on both sides, so on the left has been shown the plain framework, and on the right has been shown that same framework with more added to it. There has been added solid finishing wood work, such as false door frames, wainscoting boards, a mission shelf, all of which are trimmed off with moulding. This woodwork is simply nailed on to the plain framework, as seen on the left, after the muslin has been put on.

The framework shown in Fig. 1 is supposed to be covered with muslin all this time. The dotted lines in the drawing all indicate framework that is covered by muslin. A sort of x-ray, as it were. The muslin is to be tacked on just as soon as the frames are built. Any good muslin will do if it is not too finely woven. A good grade of unbleached muslin is about the right thing, provided you can get it wide enough. Width is the important part. Get it as wide as you need and let the quality be secondary to that. Tack it on the frames as soon as they are ready, stretching it tightly and evenly, after which you are ready for the glue.

Glue sizing is a wonderful treatment for soft muslin. When you are ready for it, get a metal bucket and a pound or two of powdered glue at the hardware store. Fill the bucket half full of water and put it on the stove. When it gets pretty hot pour in a little powdered glue and dissolve it well before you pour in any more glue. The glue will color the water and as you pour in more glue it will begin to look as though you are making soup. While you are dissolving the glue, get ready for the muss you are going to make. Stand your scene on edge in the aisle. Cover the floor and seats all around with newspapers or drop cloths to catch the spatter from your brush. If you do not do this you will be sorry. Keep stirring the glue or it will settle on the bottom and burn. The glue size should not be any thicker than milk. It ought to look like an oyster stew without the oysters. If you get it any thicker you will feel like a fly on a sheet of tanglefoot before you get through. It is not necessary to explain how to apply it. Get a small kalsomine brush and slap it on, that is about all. When it dries, the muslin will be hard and tighter than the tightest drum you ever saw. You will also have a surface for wall paper that cannot be beat.

After the sizing is done, comes the interior woodwork. The reason it comes next is because it must be stained, and if it is stained before the wall paper is applied, you don't have to be so careful. It doesn't matter if the stain slops onto the muslin a little bit. The paper is the last thing that goes on. The framework in these scenes was made entirely of dressed cedar facing boards, ⅞ inch x 3 inches. Besides being cheap, cedar has a beautiful natural grain, that shows through any stain, like oak. The only kind of wood used in building this scene that ran wider than three inches was the wainscot or foot-board, and that was six inch cedar facing, instead of three. The gimp cleat is 1 x 2 furring, and the moulding is ordinary spruce. Three inch facing is the stuff. You will notice in Fig. 1 that it forms the bulk of the wooden part. It is nice to work with, and makes wide, strong mortices, as per Fig. 3, a and b. Plain furring is too light and would never do.

Perhaps you have wondered why I have shown the back scene in Fig. 1 higher than the sides, and wider than seems necessary. That is done merely to let you see how the back should be constructed. The sides should be as high as the back, and the back should be no wider than the edge of the sides. Did you get that? Read it over, and then look at dotted line "2" in the upper left in Fig. 1. That's how wide the back screw should be. Of course I cannot give measurements, because no two houses would be alike. These drawings will have to be freely translated by the carpenter, who can vary it to suit the case. You can get an idea from the drawings just how many sticks of wood you will need, and how much cloth and other things, by applying the measurements of your own house. In these drawings the doors are about seven feet high over all and three feet wide inside.

After the nailing, the covering, the sizing and the staining are done, you are ready for the wall paper. Again take my advice and call in the paper hanger. I know it looks awfully easy, but he will do it all while you are doping out where to hang the first sheet. In the matter of taste he may be able also to help you if you have neglected your training in that direction. The scene shown in these drawings is given as an example not only of what can be done, but what has been done. There are a thousand different ways it can be varied, according to the fancy of the manager. In Fig. 2 the center door was a blind door, against a wall. This could have been made into a long lattice window, in three panels, horizontally, using some of that imitation stained glass with a light behind it. Or perhaps a window in some other part of the scene, would lend itself well. The imitation stained glass with a light behind makes a pretty effect. You might send to a scenic artist the measurement of the center door and tell him to send you a far-away view through a doorway, with a stone balcony railing and a rose bush in the foreground.

The complete scene shown in Fig. 2 was a sparkling little gem, and many were the "Ah's" and "Oh's" when the curtain raised upon it. The woodwork was stained with Japalac to resemble oak, which the grain brush pulled along immensely. Between the baseboard and the mission shelf was wallpaper imitation of oak paneling (the shelf was placed to pan out with the measurements of the imitation panels). The panel wall paper was varnished to heighten the wood effect. Above the shelf everything was covered with a plain paper, about the color of faded terra cotta. The flies were also covered with the same. Flies were cloth covered wood frames, the same as the big frames, held in place with a nail at each end, and strengthening the whole thing.

Six inches above the shelf, a line was snapped with a chalked string as the bottom guide for the pretty Dutch frieze that went around the scene. The Dutch frieze was laid on over the faded terra-cotta. Along the edges of the scene was tacked some ½-inch imitation leather gimp, tan color, with large brass headed tacks. The gimp and tacks helped the effect, but were not absolutely necessary. There is a good strong black outline on the Dutch border as it is, so if you do not want to take the trouble of tacking it on, you may also omit the gimp cleats, as provided in Fig. 1, and simply paste the border on. But if you want the gimp, you must put the cleats in the frame while making, because you cannot make tacks hold with nothing to hold to.

The curtains were the finishing touch. They were of Nile green, sateen, 50 inches wide, and made a delightful combination. A bright red would have answered, but a good deal depends upon what the color scheme of the theater is. In the opinion of the writer, the setting of the stage should contrast with the auditorium decorative scheme. In the case of the scene represented herewith, the auditorium color scheme was red and dark green, hence the contrast on the stage, of oak, terra cotta and Nile green. Red curtains would have been too much like the body of the house, dark green curtains also, hence the Nile green curtains.

The curtains were of light material. It was necessary to make them hang as though they were of heavy plush, for two reasons; first because any draught of air would blow them around, and second, because a curtain of light material would look cheap. To do this, a fifty inch strip of half inch white cotton tape was folded lengthwise and the two edges sewed together on a sewing machine, making a sort of pouch. Each pouch was as long as the width of a curtain. Into each pouch was run a lot of regulation "BB" shot. The pouches were sewed so that one shot could not pass another, or form in bunches, and the shot lay side by side, all the length of the pouches. When the pouch ends were sewed up and you held the pouch in the hands, it was a very good imitation of a four foot garter snake; always wiggling and twisting, trying to get out of the hands and onto the floor. One of these pouches was laid into a wide hem at the bottom of each curtain and tacked there with a needle and thread at each end. The weight of them kept the curtains hanging straight at all times, and the great flexibility of the pouches allowed the curtains to hang in graceful curves at the bottom, instead of sharp angles. Besides it made the goods look more expensive than they were. If the curtains are to be used much for entrances, they should be split into 25 inch halves for the sake of convenience.

The wall paper used in this setting was all purchased at one store, not twenty minutes walk from this office. Altogether the cost of it was about $5.50. This may seem a little high, but the Dutch border is a work of art and brings the price up some. It is eighteen inches wide and runs thirty feet without a repeat, lithographed in full colors and retailed for $3.00. The imitation panel paper is twenty-one inches wide and sells for 60c per roll, a roll meaning 8 yards. The plain terra cotta paper comes thirty inches wide and costs 20 cents per roll. The gimp is retailed at 17 cents per roll, containing twenty-five yards, which is more than plenty. The tacks cost 35 cents per hundred, and should be about six inches apart if you use any. There is some waste in hanging the oak panel paper, because it is necessary to cut out a panel from every strip that is hung.

Perhaps that isn't clear. Look at the bottom panels in Fig. 2. Notice the space between the bottom panels and the foot-board. If the paper extended lower the next figure would be a small panel like the one at the top. Naturally, anyone would suppose it easy enough to place that small panel at the head of the next column, without waste. But, you see, it has been cut off flush to get that space between the base board and the bottom panel, so in order to get to another small panel with margin at the top, it is necessary to cut out the spoiled panel and lose one as well. So do not forget to figure that in. This panel paper comes in mahogany, mission, green and oak. All are tasty. To any of our readers who are interested enough to write, the editor will send the address of the wall paper supply house handling this paper, together with the stock numbers of the different patterns.

In conclusion, please notice in Fig. 2 I have allowed the left frame to remain too short, the same as I did with both side frames in Fig. 1. It makes a bad connection with the flies, as you will see at a glance, and is not a workmanlike job. On the upper right in Fig. 2, you will observe that the side frame has been carried up as high as the back frame. The flies are nailed through from the back of the side frame and make a neat close connection. Without furniture of any kind the scene looks a little bare, but with a dainty gilt chair, a small book case, etc., the effect is much better. Also try a few steins on the shelf and a small table with a fresh looking spray of pink Harrig in a vase, and you will have a setting as tempting as it is pretty.

NEWS BRIEFS.

Suffolk, Va.—During the month of April the city of Suffolk suffered the loss by death of one of its best known characters, Mr. George V. Harrig. He was affectionately known to most of the citizens as "Pop" Harrig and his death called forth expressions of sorrow from all parts of the city. At the time of his death he was owner and manager of the Academy, which he had managed for a number of years. Mr. Harrig was of a most friendly and charitable nature, and had frequently aided worthy charities with benefit performances at the Academy.

Cleveland, Ohio.—Cleveland's oldest moving picture theater, The American, 716 Superior Avenue, passed out of existence during the month of April. It was opened ten years ago by Wiliam Bullock, who has since gone West. Mr. Bullock was one of those pioneer exhibitors who was not in the change daily class. The fact is that when he got hold of a film, he ran it for days and weeks, until he heard where another could be obtained before making a change. For exhibiting a reel of pictures that ran fifteen minutes, he obtained an admission of from 15 to 25 cents, without music and without seats. He was not hampered by hypercritical law-making of any and all kinds, and therefore he made some money. His successor has been glad if he could make money in these later days by showing four reels daily for five cents, changing twice a week. All of which is an illustration of what superfluous law-making and over-competition will do to minimize the profits of any business.

QUESTIONS ON LAST WEEK'S LESSONS.

Do NOT look at the lesson in preparing your answers. If you do the answers will be of no practical value.

1. Is there more than one kind of luminous body?
2. What is sight? How would you describe or define it?
3. Why is sight absent when there is no light?
4. What gases combine, in the process of ordinary combustion?
5. What agent necessary to illumination is released in the process?
6. When a tallow candle is lighted the grease gradually disappears. What becomes of it?
7. Of what is the dark portion of flame composed? How prove its composition?
8. Describe the composition of flame?
9. Why is the flame from alcohol practically non-luminous?
10. What factor produces luminousity in combustion?

A LUMINOUS BODY

is one which is in itself a source of that essential necessary to vision—light. Objects other than luminous bodies are only visible by reason of reflection of light rays from their surfaces, the rays always originally emanating from some luminous body. These objects receive rays from some luminous body, be it the sun, a lamp, a fire-flame or what-not, and by reflection return them to our eyes; by this means they become visible. But that is not all the story, since, did all bodies reflect light the same, no one object, except those luminous, would be distinguishable from any other object. All would appear as one solid surface of the same color, without shadows or inequalities, save for a skyline. Fortunately for us (since life would be impossible under such conditions) every object, and every part of an object, reflects light differently. We thus have color and shadows, which really constitutes ninety-nine one-hundredths of what we call vision. The ordinary pine board box reflects yellow rays. The different seams (called grain) in the wood reflect different shades of yellow, else the board would be simply a solid yellow surface as though painted. The cracks reflect the light to our eyes differently than does the surface of the board, hence we are able to "see" them. The nails reflect still different colored rays, knotholes, other colors, and the end of the box reflects still differently. By these differences in reflection of light each tiny portion of an object which is different from its surroundings is seen and noted by the eye.

Objects may become visible by reason of double reflection of light rays as we are able to see the moon, a non-luminous body, at night, because the rays of the sun, at the time invisible to us, are reflected to our eyes by the lunar surface. We also see, dimly, surrounding objects on the earth's surface; this by reason of the fact that the sun rays reflected from the moon strike these objects, and are by them re-reflected to our eyes. With each reflection, however, there is absorption of certain portions of the rays (some tend to our eyes only the green, some the red, some the blue, etc., etc., portion of the white rays received). There may even be triple (or more) reflection as in a shed, one side of which is open but away from the moon. We may be able of the moon be bright, or some white surface be the reflecting medium, to dimly see objects in the shed, notwithstanding that moonlight cannot directly enter. The sun rays strike the moon and are by it reflected to objects in front of the open side of the shed and is by them re-reflected to the objects within the shed and by them re-re reflected to our eyes. How bright this reflected light will be, will depend on the intensity of the original light and the reflective power of the objects themselves. The point I am attempting to show is that ALL LIGHT EMANATES FROM A LUMINOUS BODY and that for objects other than luminous bodies to be visible to our eyes, light from a luminous body MUST SOME-HOW OR OTHER REACH THEIR SURFACE in order that they be visible to our eyes. In A, figure 2, is shown the course of a ray from the sun to our eyes by which some object becomes visible by day. B, fig. 2, shows the course of the same ray by night. In these drawings, no attempt has been made at preserving proportions as to relative size or distance.

The light rays which strike a body are called INCIDENT RAYS, or incident light Rays which make any body, except a luminous body, visible are called REFLECTED rays. Rays of light striking any object are partially absorbed by that body, the remainder being scattered. From every infinitesimal, visible portion of the surface of any object, luminous or non-luminous, rays are scattered in every direction from which it is visible to the eye. THIS IS THE FIRST IMPORTANT LESSON THE STUDENT MUST GRASP AND FULLY UNDERSTAND BEFORE PROCEEDING FURTHER. Upon this fundimental point very much depends and I would strongly advise every reader of these lessons to study this point carefully until an understanding is had of the matter and what naturally follows, viz.: that light rays are crossing and recrossing in every direction, literally by the billions. Unless you fully grasp this point and its full meaning you will be unable to understand the meaning of many things which will come up as we proceed with the lessons. To make the matter more clear I have drawn fig. 3 in which we look across the edge of some object from two points of which, each point about the size of a needle, lines representing rays of light are seen to come. Although only two points are shown, similar rays are reflected from each of the thousands of other points which go to make up the surface of the object in every direction except back into the object itself. They go straight out, up, down and sideways. The rays from each of the millions of points composing the surface of the object are wandered literally by the millions and EACH NEEDLE POINT OF THE SURFACE OF ANY VISIBLE OBJECT WHATSOEVER, IS SENDING OUT ITS OWN INCIDENT RAYS, IF A LUMINOUS BODY, OR REFLECTED RAYS IF NON LUMINOUS, AS DESCRIBED. If you carefully consider this and STUDY IT you should soon grasp the idea and realize that this MUST BE TRUE, else objects could not and would not be visible to our eyes from many directions and in every portion of their surface. To illustrate this I have drawn fig. 4, in which "a" represents a surface, across which we are looking; b, c, d and e representing eyes at various points, to each of which the object is visible.

It will readily be seen that if the rays traveled from any given point or points on the surface only in the direction of d, then b, c and e would be unable to see these points. A study of this diagram will, I believe, prove to you that in order that the surface of an object be visible from different points or positions, it is absolutely essential that rays go from every portion of the surface in every direction from whence it is visible. This being true we readily see that rays of light are, as has been pointed out, eminating from every pin-point of the surface of every visible object and these rays are practically numberless, crossing each other in every direction until the effect is that of mass, the ray being, in practice, rather a term of convenience,

Eight-Inch Lens for Sale.—Mr. Louis Mees, Hamburg, Pa., comes in with the following: "I notice in the last issue a party in New York will be in need of an 8-inch lens. A few months ago I bought a Bosch & Lomb 8-inch E. F., M. P. lens and a half size 33-inch stereo lens. These will give the party the right size picture at 105 feet. They cost me $35 and I will sell same for $22.50."

Ordinarily it is not the province of the department to advertise goods, but in a case of this kind where two souls may possibly be made happy, we give the necessary space.

Embryo Operator.—Boston, Mass., writes: 'Will you kindly give me advice concerning the best method of procedure in order to become efficient as an operator and secure a position? I have another trade, but I cannot secure permanent employment at it and would like to take up operating. In Boston there are four so-called 'Schools of Operating' which profess to turn men out in a few weeks, guaranteeing that they pass the State Board examination and receive a license; also guaranteeing that they be fully competent to take a position as operator in any theater. Three of them do not guarantee a position after graduation,' but one, under certain conditions, does. I would be only too willing to pay necessary tuition if I were assured a permanent position. I am 32 and see only a poor prospect ahead by working at my own trade."

I would suggest that if you wish to learn operating, and are willing to pay for tuition, arrangements be made with some first-class Boston operator to teach you, afterwards giving you employment for a time as helper. Just how this would work out would depend on the ability of the man as a teacher. It is the best thing I can suggest under the circumstances. The school, if rightly conducted, would be a better proposition in that you would get the necessary technical knowledge which the average operator would be unable to give, since, although he might himself have the knowledge, he might not have the ability to successfully impart it to another. However, the matter as to whether the schools up there are "rightly conducted" is one open to question, according to the reports received from Boston.

Arc Reflector.—Mr. L. A. Normandin, Fall River, Mass., writes: "Noting the discussion concerning various reflectors, screens and other devices for observing the arc, I wish to say that there is now a patent pending for a perfect and adjustable reflector designed to be attached to the lamp of any moving picture machine in such a way that the operator can see the arc in any position, either sitting down or standing up, near or far from the machine, with as much ease as I can see the spot on the aperture plate. The reflector may be attached or detachedi in an instant. It can be pushed up out of the way when not in use, or can be carried in the vest pocket, as it closes like a pen-knife. As soon as the patent is granted it will be advertised in the Moving Picture World, probably the latter part of May, at which time full details will be given and the device sold at a nominal price."

I hope you have got something good and that you will meet with success. I will, however, utter this word of warning: A great many different devices have already been used for the purpose mentioned. It doesn't seem possible that you could evolve anything radically different from some of the many schemes already practiced by operators. However, I shall await with interest the full description of your device.

Slides Patented.—Montana (name of town suppressed by request) writes: "Find enclosed $1.50 for Handbook. I have noticed lately several letters in regard to carbon setting, and they all seem to arrive at about the same conclusion. I personally, however, have failed, as yet, to find any regular rule for setting carbons. The rule given in the Handbook is fine, and the only one where current does not vary much from 110 volts. I have, however, found that with current running from 90 to 118 volts, as we used to have here, the straight trim gave the best light. Why is it that Western pictures are always said to be the best? Traveling men tell us that this town of 2,500 people has the best pictures in the State, and that our projection is far ahead of that seen in the East. As regards the advertising slides described by Mr. Martin, will say that the idea has been used here over two years and is patented by a printer who was a former operator."
